PREFACE

LAKṢMĪDHARA'S Kṛtyakalpataru is easily the most important as well as the most complete digest (nibhandha) of Dharmas'āstra that has come down to us. It is also the earliest now extant. Some of the earlier works of the class mentioned by it in the verses which introduce the entire work at the beginning of Brahmacārikāṇḍa, are now lost, and like the famous smṛti of Bṛhaspati the citations from them, which occasionally appear in later nibandhas like the Ratnākara and the Vīramitrodaya, were probably made second-hand after the original works had perished in the deluge of the Muslim conquest in the twelfth century A. D. The Kalpataru itself nearly shared this fate. 'Holy Kās'i' in which it was probably written, was repeatedly sacked, and the mounds near Rājghāt mark the buried remains of the most important part of the capital of Govindacandra. More than half the work has survived in solitary manuscripts. It has made the task of editing the work one of exceptional difficulty. Lakṣmīdhara's successors in the field of Dharmas'āstra show great deference to the readings of ancient texts that he adopts. A work whose integrity and accuracy have commanded such respect demands the most scrupulous care in editing.

Works on Dharmas'āstra did not attract the attention of the pioneers of Sanskrit studies among Europeans in India and outside. In the early days of British rule the necessity to know the civil law, as administered to Hindus by Hindus, may have helped the revival of interest in Dharmas'āstra, but it did not. British administrators narrowed down their interest to one section of Dharmas'āstra, viz. Vyavahāra, forgetting that litigation plays only a minor part in the lives of most persons governed by a system of laws and legal usages. Even in the study of Vyavahāra the early British administrators preferred digests "composed to order," by paṇḍits engaged for the purpose like Jagannātha,

T. E. Colebrooke's teacher. Copies of the digests were supplied to law courts, and to this day, while Jagannātha's digest remains unprinted, its views are available only in Colebrooke's famous English version of it. As a result, one of the most vivid and prolific branches of Sanskrit literature, viz., that dealing with Dharma, remained largely neglected, till it became the quarry in which scholars, who desired to mark their erudition or powers of criticism and synthesis, dug for material. This is strikingly illustrated by the fate of the Kṛtyakalpataru itself. When, in the course of his examination of the collection of manuscripts in the Royal Library at Udaipur in Mewar, the late Dr. P. Peterson found (in 1882) an almost complete set of the work (twelve parts out of the fourteen), he failed to recognize its value, and gave its title wrongly as Kṛtya-Ratnākara. His interests were in other directions, and he was unfamiliar with Dharmas'āstra. In the same way, Dr. F. Kielhorn, when he made a list of manuscripts in the Bhonsle Rāj Library at Nagpur, contented himself with lumping together under one title half-a-dozen Kāṇḍas of the nibandha. The credit for first drawing attention to the importance of this great book must go to the late Rai Bahadur Monmohan Chakravarthy, who concluded an article on "the History of Smṛti in Bengal and Mithila" (which he contributed to the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal in 1915) with a note on Lakṣmīdhara. While the emulation of judges, learned in Sanskrit, inspired the study of almost every accessible digest of Vyavahāra, and especially of Dāyabhāga, the scarcity of manuscripts of the Vyavahāra section of the Kṛtyakalpataru left it unedited and untranslated into the official language of Indian courts of law. How little progress was made in our knowledge of this cardinal treatise on Dharma, in all its branches, may be seen by comparing the section devoted to it in Mahāmahopādhyāya Dr. P. V. Kane's monumental History of Dharmas'āstra, Vol. I, 1929 with the account of it given by M. M. Chakravarthy fourteen years earlier.

It was this obscuration by time—and destiny—of the magnitude of this nibandha, which induced me to offer to edit it for the Gaekwad's Oriental Series, when a suggestion that I should contribute to the Series was personally made to me by His Highness the late Mahārāja Sayāji Rao Gaekwad. After the offer was accepted, and a transcript of the set in the Udaipur Palace Library secured for my examination, as the original manuscript was not in a condition to permit of frequent consultation even on the spot, all my available leisure and resources have been devoted to its study, to the collection, after searches conducted personally all over India, of surviving manuscripts of its parts, and to its editing, with comparative and elucidatory notes and introductions, which endeavoured to sum up in English its main doctrines in their context in the evolution of Dharma interpretation. The work has proceeded in spite of impediments caused by ill-health and the pre-occupations of other duties, restricting the amount of available leisure that could be devoted to the task; but, its progression has been steady, if slow. To the difficulties inherent in the task of suitably preparing for the press an out-standing digest of the kind, which have slowed down the pace, there have been additions in the scarcity of paper and of labour troubles in printing establishments. In surmounting them, I have been sustained by the steady and unfailing support extended to me by the General Editor of the Series, Rājyaratna, Jñānajyoti, Dr. B. Bhaṭṭāchārya, who has recognized the value of the Kṛtyakalpataru, and the vital need to spare no pains in suitably editing and publishing it.

Five kāṇḍas out of the fourteen have now been published. The hope of finding manuscripts of kāṇḍas, for which only single manuscripts existed, has led to the publication of later sections of the digest before the earlier. This has deprived the reader of an opportunity to notice and appreciate the presentation of the topics of Dharma in logical order, which is one of the merits of the work of Lakṣmīdhara, but when the book is completely available, the feature will become apparent and be valued. Sometimes, when the printing of a kāṇḍa was almost finished, its release has had to be held up in order that the readings of manuscripts that had been discovered, when the printing was approaching completion, might be incorporated in suitable appendices. The published sections are those numbered as the second (Gṛhasthakāṇḍa), the fifth (Dānakāṇḍa), the sixth (Tīrthakāṇḍa), the eleventh (Rājadharma-kāṇḍa) and the fourteenth (Mokṣakāṇḍa). They were released in 1944, 1941, 1942, 1943, and 1945 respectively. Brahmacārikāṇḍa, with which the digest begins, is thus the sixth in the order of release. Its publication might have been held up for sometime more if there seemed a reasonable expectation of a second manuscript of this section becoming available. Of this there seems to be no hope.

Brahmacārikāṇḍa opens the way to the study of Dharma in the Kṛtya-kalpataru. Its earliest chapters are devoted to the discussion of the nature and scope of Dharma, its divisions and aims, its sources and modes of comprehension and interpretation. A section on the recognized 'conventions' (paribhāṣā)—roughly analogous to a modern "General Clauses Act" in modern codes—follows. Lakṣmīdhara then proceeds to deal with saṁskāra, finishing with those of brahmacarya and snāna. The saṁskāra of vivāha and the incidents to it form the subject of the second kāṇḍa. Other writers, e.g. Mitramis'ra or Caṇḍes'vara, have followed the saṁskāras (sacraments) serially, or taken up the daily routine of a person (āḥnika) and dealt with the duties for each division of the day, or month etc. Such a mode of approach will miss the ās'rama aspect of Dharma in relation to varṇa, sex and occupation. Lakṣmīdhara elects to follow the order of treatment indicated by logical sequence and importance. His first kāṇḍa gives topics which are necessarily postulated in the second and third (Gṛhastha and Naiyatakālika), just as the second kāṇḍa, in its treatment of marriage, anticipates topics which other digests bring under Vyavahāra. Vyavahāra occupies the twelfth place sequentially, following the indication of the duties of the king (Rājadharma), which is given the eleventh place. Unlike Mitramis'ra and other later digest-writers, Lakṣmīdhara does not repeat or reproduce in one section what has been dealt with in another part of his work. He intended the nibandha to be read as a whole in order that its organic unity, coherence and logic might be apparent.

The very brief references to himself and his patron Govindacandra, the last emperor of Hindusthan, who merited the style, given in the verses prefixed to Brahmacārikāṇḍa are in their place in the proem to the work. The valuable data they furnish have been utilized in the Introduction to Dānakāṇḍa, the first of the parts of the digest to be published. All the relevant questions concerning the date of the work, its author etc. are dealt with in that Introduction. They are not reproduced in the Introduction to Brahmacārikāṇḍa which deals with matters more relevant to the correct perception of Dharma than the historical matter that to many modern students may be more interesting. Later research has not added illumination to the historical findings in that Introduction, which may be regarded as the historical preface to the Digest. The discovery of fresh manuscripts of sections in which the introductory verse (maṅgalas'loka) was missing in the solitary manuscripts till then available for the sections, necessitate a slight alteration in their numbering. And that is all.

A feature of the manuscript of Brahmacārikāṇḍa, in which it holds a bad pre-eminence over other defective manuscripts of the work, is to be found not only in distortions of words, suggesting that parts were perhaps written to dictation in the original of which the Udaipur manuscript (itself of the 16th century probably) is a transcript, but in the large elisions and omissions (indicating scriptorial negligence) in the quotations and comments. Such omissions have had to be filled up after much labour in tracing citations of the passages in later digests. In the printed text now released the missing parts so supplied are shown within rectangular brackets. The very large number of such passages will give an idea of the labour that has had to be expended in preparing the text.

As is usual with him, Lakṣmīdhara begins the kāṇḍa with an enumeration of the chapters or sub-sections (parva) and an indication of the subject-matter of each section. Usually, each parva ends with a colophon, indicating its authorship and place in the kāṇḍa and Digest. The corruption that this kāṇḍa has undergone is reflected in the presence of the colophons at the end of only two out of twenty-two parvas. (See pages 197 and 264 infra). There is no colophon at the end of the work. Dr. Peterson therefore suspected that the manuscript was incomplete and said so. A comparison of the matter in the concluding pages with the description (pratijñā) of the contents, with which the work begins, shows however that the Manuscript is complete, except for the missing colophon, or a quotation or two. The conclusion runs naturally into the Second Kāṇḍa. There is no gap to be bridged over between the two. There seems however to have been an interchange of folia in the manuscript of which the Udaipur manuscript is a transcript or copy, resulting in some confusion, and the suspicion of a break towards the end. I have shown on p. 280 (footnote) that what appears in the manuscript as the terminal should go to page 264 as the commentary on a citation from Āpastamba. There might possibly be justification for one or two minor re-arrangements of this kind in other parts of the manuscript (see citation from Manu and Hārīta on p. 236 for instance) but I have not felt justified in making the changes. An author who attempts to compose a vast digest may be held to gather experience as he proceeds with the composition, and to make minor mistakes in the earlier parts that he instinctively learns to avoid in the later. A nibandha requiries many years to complete, and possibly many hands to make atleast the first draft of, which is finished up by the author. An inflexible standard of accuracy and freedom from minor defects of arrangement cannot be predicated in such a work, in epochs in which printing was unknown.

Lakṣmīdhara's merits comprise two qualities : selectivity in citation and brevity in comment. As a judge and great minister, who had got into the habit of not regarding himself as called on to explain his conclusions, he makes a habit of citing relevant authority, preferring the most ancient to comparatively recent, and Manu to other smṛtikāras, and ending with a statement of his decision (vyavasthā) in cases in which the matter under treatment had led to differences of opinion. It has been a fascinating pursuit to trace from the diffuse digests, which came later, the controversies which he clinched by a definite decision, like the decree of a court of final appeal.

A work of this kind might furnish scope or justification for elaborate annotation. The temptation has been resisted. The reading of the Introduction, in which the place of the ideas of the Kṛtyakalpataru in the fabric of Dharmaśāstra is indicated wherever possible, might help a reader.

Brahmacāṛikānda is, in sequence of printing, the sixth volume of the Digest. Three more are now in the press, viz., those dealing with śrāddha, śuddhi and vyavahāra, and considerable progress has been made in their printing. A fourth is taking the place of Brahmacārikāṇḍa at the Vasanta Press by courtesy of its Management and Superintendent. If it is given to me to see the early completion of these four, ten out of fourteen kāṇḍas would be made available to the world. With advancing years and diminishing powers, it will spell of a self-confidence that a student of Dharma is taught not to foster, to foresee the completion of the entire work except with the faith in the motive power and purpose, which are implied in the doctrine of sātvika-tyāga.

It only remains to acknowledge my obligation for help in the preparation of the manuscript for the press, for corrections as the printing proceeded, for preparing the Appendices, and for assistance of kinds too many to be catalogued, to my old pupil Mr. A. N. Krishna Aiyangar, M.A., L.T., of the Adyar Library. Pandit N. Ramachandra Bhat, Vyākaraṇa S'iromani, has helped in taking the manuscript through the press, and in detecting and correcting slips in the original. I have had the benefit of advice and criticism on a few topics of the Introduction from Mr. N, Raghavacharya, M.A., L.T., formerly of the Madras Educational Service. To Mr. C. Subbarayudu, Superintendent of the Vasanta Press, the printing of the work, with the neatness that marks the books that come out of his press, has been not an official task but a duty inspired by love of Sanātana-Dharma.

INTRODUCTION

THE recovery of the Kṛtya-kalpataru of Lakṣmīdhara should be deemed an event of importance in the history of the modern study of Dharmas'āstra, as it must have been when it first appeared early in the twelfth century.[1] The first modern European authority on the subject (J. Jolly) had hardly any knowledge of it till his death. It had attained rank as a high authority almost immediately after its composition. Aniruddha (c. 1160 A.D) and Ballāla Sena (c. 1165 A.D.), who were only a generation removed from Lakṣmīdhara, show the influence of his great work on their own compositions[2]. Thirty years ago, a keen student of Dharmas'āstra showed its great influence on almost all the great smārtas of not only Bengal and Mithila but of all parts of North India and the Dakhan for some centuries.[3] Pratāparudra, the author of Sarasvatīvilāsa, devoted an entire sub-section in his chapter on inheritance and partition (dāyabhāga) to a summary of Lakṣmīdhara's views on the subject. His veneration made him refer to Lakṣmīdhara as if he was an ancient ācārya or sage by describing him as Bhagavān.[4] Almost every writer of nibandhas after his day used Lakṣmīdhara's work as a quarry from which to extract the materials for building his own edifice of Dharmas'astra.[5] European writers have been inclined to treat nibandhas composed by or under the orders of ruling princes as approximating more to the modern conception of codes than those whose authors were merely scholars, whose opinions would, at the most, have only such value as the responsa prudentum of jurisconsults had in ancient Rome. To them, Lakṣmīdhara's work would specially appeal as it was undertaken under the commands of a great ruler, whose dominions extended to almost the whole of Hindusthan, and who reigned over the area for over half a century.[1] It was moreover the composition of one who was not merely a scholar, but a judge in a big kingdom, chief minister to a powerful king, and could say openly that it was largely through his advice and efforts that his sovereign gained many victories over enemies and extended and consolidated his kingdom.[2] Moreover, high office came to Lakṣmīdhara by inheritance, as his father Hṛdayadhara had been chief minister (apparently to Govindacandra's predecessor).[3]

He was obviously unfamiliar, even in 1928, with those parts of it which he described in the English version of his Hindu Law and Custom." (Introduction to Dānakāṇḍa, p. 2.)

To conservative readers, to whom the mere position of an author of a treatise on Dharma would hardly appeal, the restrained references that Lakṣmīdhara makes to his personal qualifications and training would hold a greater attraction. The brief statement that he prefixes to each section of the work indicates his special competence (adhikāra) to write it. Thus, he claims that he had undergone the austere training in brahmacarya, when he was in the first āśrama, in spite of his birth and affluence, and in the second āśrama, he had been a model gṛhastha, discharging with meticulous care the duties incumbent on householders of the first varṇa. He had propitiated the manes by the due performance of śrāddhas. He had discharged fully the duties of iṣṭa and pūrta, performing the enjoined sacrifices and yajñas, had excavated tanks, planted trees, and founded settlements of pious and learned Brāhmaṇas (agrahāras). He had made many of the enjoined gifts (dāna), but true to the rule that a good Brāhmaṇa should not readily accept gifts himself, he had accepted none, as is evident from the absence of his name in any of the numerous inscriptions of the reign which commemorate the gifts of Govindacandra.[4] Out of his affluence, he had provided rest-houses on the routes for pilgrims who undertook tīrtha-yātrā and built bathing ghats in sacred tanks and streams. He had himself set an example to the world by the scrupulous performance of expiatory rites. As a judge he had shown his mastery of the intricacies of law, and won the encomia of the experts who crowded his courts. As chief minister he had, like a king, undertaken successfully the 'yajña (sacrifice) of the protection of the world (viśvapālana).' His wise guidance as well as the force of his magic (mantra) had made Govindacandra walk in the ways of righteousness and attain supremacy over other kings. Though a gṛhastha, he had attained, even like an ascetic, the mastery of the learning and of his body which ensured mukti, and enabled him from knowledge as well as personal experience to guide others to the way to emancipation. He had in short been a statesman, judge, man of affairs, scholar and a householder of ideals. Such a combination of qualifications has not been the fortune of any later writer on Dharmaśāstra. It is therefore no wonder that later writers treat with the utmost deference Lakṣmīdhara's dicta (vyavasthā), and that even his readings of texts of smṛtis, which differ from those generally accepted, command respectful attention.

There are other features of the Kṛtya-Kalpataru, which make it unique in the literature of Dharmaśāstra. It is built on a careful plan, which largely follows the arrangement of topics in Manu's great work, to which (by general consent as well as by scriptural authority) among smṛtis a position of preeminence is given. In the selection of authorities, he exercises a discrimination that would have won the approval of Ballāla Sena, who derides the indiscriminate citation of purāṇas and other sources, without consideration of their intrinsic authority.[1] He is restrained in quotation, and does not yield to the temptation (to which writers of digests and bhāṣyas succumb) to quote extensively and indiscriminately, seeking to overwhelm the reader by a parade of erudition. He rarely intrudes his own opinion, allowing the sources to speak for themselves, and helping in their correct apprehension by brief notes of interpretation or comment. His expressions of opinion on controverted points are terse, clear and decisive, like the pronouncements of a judge and administrator. There is no overlapping in the sections of his digest. In spite of all this the Kṛtya-Kalpataru was completed gradually in fourteen kāṇḍas, and in mere size is excelled only by the huge and incomplete work of Hemādri (c. 1260 A.D.) and the Vīramitrodaya of Mitramis'ra (c. 1600), which are characterized by diffuseness and lack of discrimination in the selection of authorities, as well as lack of point in discussions. Vīramitrodaya (like Toḍarānanda) also has included topics which are of doubtful relevance in a dharma-nibandha.[1] It is worthy of mention that the Kṛtya-Kalpataru, in spite of its great volume, apparently did not attempt to treat of the spacious subject of expiation (prāyas'citta), to which Manu devoted one of his twelve 'books,' and Yājñavalkya nearly a third of his more compact treatise. The treatment of this vast subject would have swollen the size of Lakṣmīdhara's work and made it easily one of the biggest, if not the largest, of its class. Lakṣmīdhara does not give in extenso the Vedic mantras or prayoga, but is content to give the briefest indications of them. In this respect he is unlike later writers who swell the bulk of their works, in which they absorb large slices of the Kṛtya-Kalpataru (often without acknowledgment), by giving the mantras and prayogas to be followed by every s'ākhā of every Vedic School.

[1] See the upodghāta to Dānasāgara, printed in Dānakāṇḍa, pp. 337-345.

Another feature in which the Kṛtya-Kalpataru is unique is its vivid realization from the commencement of the final purpose of life, in the s'āstraic view, and of the balanced and orderly pursuit of the four aims of existence (puruṣārtha) culminating in the attainment of mukti. Among smṛtis, that of Manu alone shows a vivid realization of this purpose of any exposition of Dharma. The ordained arrangement of the population in different varṇas and of men in different ās'ramas has the ultimate and easy attainment of the summum bonum, to which the pursuit of the first three aims of life (trivarga) will lead. It is noteworthy that besides Lakṣmīdhara only one writer, viz. Mitramis'ra, has included a separate treatment of the ways of mukti (release) in his digest.[2] That the ordinary writers of digests should be chary of attempting to supply such pinnacles to their edifices of Dharmas'āstra is intelligible. Achieving the task with success postulates in the author not merely a mastery of the sacred and philosophic literature of India but a mental and spiritual bent, which would give life to what would otherwise be an unconvincing exposition of theory, but a record of pure and disinterested life dedicated to enjoined duty (Dharma) and the good of the world (lokasaṁgrahaḥ) that would win spontaneous respect for opinions or decisions voiced by such a person. It is possible to presume from the Mokṣakāṇda, as well as other parts of the Kṛtya-Kalpatru generally, that Lakṣmīdhara was believed to have possessed the adhikāra (authority) to pronounce on Dharma, springing from such a combinations of qualifications. Weight will not attach to mere learning devoid of purity of aims and life.

THE UTILITY OF DIGESTS

Kṛtya-Kalpataru virtually begins the series of digests which become the vehicles for conveying authoritative expositions of Dharma in the centuries that followed. They practically replace the Bhāṣyas or commentaries like those of Asahāya, Vis'varūpa, Medhātithi, Aparārka and Vijñānes'vara, which, while commenting on the text of a chosen smṛti, brought in a wealth of quotation and discussion to amplify, reinforce or interpret the text. Among commentators two types may be seen. The first is not much concerned with providing equivalents for difficult words in the text or annotating it, but enters into scientific discussions of the validity of the text, its consistency with s'ruti and its real drift. The bhāṣyas of the two great ninth century scholiasts, Vis'ves'vara and Medhātithi stand at the head of this class. The chief aim of Vis'ves'vara's work is to illustrate the Mīmāmsa postulate that for every dictum in a smṛti there is a Vedic source. Kumārila, who belonged to the same epoch, did the work but was concerned only with finding illustrations for the doctrine and not with supporting the texts of any specific smṛti. Vis'ves'vara's chief service in his commentary on Yājñavalkya-smṛti is the abundant citation of Vedic 'sources' of the texts.

Medhātithi excels in discussions as with an invisible critic who takes up a plausible position. The work of these two great writers was done so thoroughly for the two cardinal smṛtis that their successors did not essay a similar task, but made the smṛti texts on which they had undertaken to comment virtually pegs on which to hang complete discussions of topics.[1] The works of Aparārka and Vijñānesʹvara are virtually nibandhas, but as they are tied down to the arrangement followed by their original smṛti, their works lack the natural order and symmetry of a digest. Mādhavācārya's commentary on Parāsʹara-smṛti belongs to this type of bhāṣya-nibandha, as is Nandapaṇḍita's extensive commentary on Viṣṇusmṛti (17th century).[2] The distinction attained by earlier nibandhas leads to the supercession of the commentary by the digest. The digests of the latter half of the seventeenth and the eighteenth century reflect the ambition of authors or of princes that patronized them to vie with the great men responsible for the earliest digests. The additions made by their works to doctrine or interpretation are negligible, and they barely do no more than reproduce what has been laid down in the great nibandhas and commentaries. They represent conformity to a fashion, more than provision for a need that such compositions can alone meet. Jayasiṁha-kalpudruma, and Ahalyā-kāmadhenu (to cite two nibandhas of the 18th century)[3] come under this category, as does a still larger digest on saṁskāra and prāysʹcitta composed and printed under command of Maharaja Raṇavīrasimha of Kāṣmir, who died in 1885.[4]

The later history of this class of Dharma literature should not make one miss the specific demand which was met by the earliest bhāṣyas and nibandhas. The history of Dharmasʹāstra falls roughly into five periods in which there is some overlapping of form as well as composition between period and period. The earliest is that of the Kalpasūtra, i.e., the Vedic ritual manual in aphoristic form, which dealt with śrauta, śulva, gṛhya and dharma, the last forming then the least important section of the corpus. Complete kalpasūtras are now extant only for the schools of Baudhāyana, Āpastamba and Hiraṇyakeśin.[1] These schools flourished mostly in Southern India. We have Dharmasūtras passing under the names of Gautama and Vaṣiṣṭha, which are declared as belonging respectively to the Sāma Veda and Ṛg-Veda respectively.[2] The theory that they are surviving fragments of lost kalpasūtras belonging to those Vedic schools (caraṇa) has been discounted, and it is suggested that not every caraṇa had a complete corpus of kalpasūtra, embracing all the divisions of the type.[3] As regards the contents of Dharmasūtras, there is little that is distinctive in them to attach them to specific Vedas, unless it be the references to mantras to be used on specific occasions or cited as authorities. However it be, the belief that the Vedic canon taught a homogenous doctrine—eka-vākyatva[4]—was acted on in the acceptance of dharmasūtra works as applicable to every one irrespective of the caraṇa to which he belonged.

[4] The Library of the Hindu University at Benares has a set of the work.

But Dharmasūtras, even when not forming integral parts of a kalpasūtra, had one disability from the standpoint of the learner. They were learnt from oral exposition by a teacher, and the aphorisms (sūtra) were largely like very brief indications of subject matter, which would be filled up by oral exposition. The apparent lopsidedness of the content of Dharmasūtras, which are very brief in some topics and more extensive in others, is due to this feature. It is not right to presume therefrom either lopsidedness of treatment in oral exposition, or the ignoring of the subjects treated of with excessive brevity in the sūtras. As time passed and some more convenient means of acquiring knowledge of Dharma except from a gurukula had been found, the aphoristic literature of smṛtis yielded its place to versified smṛtis or smṛtis partly in prose and partly in verse (like those of Viṣṇu and Hārīta) and comprehensive versified smṛtis (saṁhita) came into vogue, like those of Manu and Yājñavalkya. Versified smṛtis belonged to no specific schools. They supplemented one another, showed individual variety in treatment of topics, and in spite of the presumption of a common source in s'ruti, often exhibited minor doctrinal variations. Bṛhaspatismṛti is virtually an explanatory enlargement (vārttika) of Manusmrti.[1] The necessity felt for a more elaborate treatment of expiation, for practical use, was met in Yājñavalkyasmṛti, which in spite of its compactness devoted a third of its content to the topic. Similarly, Nāradasmṛti and Kātyāyana-smṛti met the requirements of those who needed fuller guidance on vyavāhāra than was available in the older works.

The need for reconciling, in accordance with the postulate of homogeneity of doctrine and teaching,[2] the dicta in the growing literature of smṛtis, and the need for meeting the objections of those who required the Vedic basis of smṛti dicta lead to the composition of commentaries like those of Asahāya, Vis'varūpa and Medhātithi. The need for more convenient and compact manuals next leads to the composition of versified compendia (saṁgrahas), like the lost Smṛtiviveka of Medhātithi and the lost Smṛtisaṁgraha and the Ṣaṭ-triṁs'anmata and Caturviṁs'atimata. The ground having been cleared by the new literature of expository comment, the time is ripe for the production of standard commentries like those of Aparāka, and Vijñānes'vara, as well as elaborate digests or nibandhas which present in orderly sequence the accepted Dharma doctrines with the authorities for them. With the nibandha the last stage in the evolution of Dharmas'āstra literature is reached.

The emergence of the nibandha (including bhāṣyas, which are virtually digests, though not so termed) is historically due to the demand for statements of Dharma which will be clear, cogent and complete, embracing every branch of life's activity that can lead to the attainment of summum bonum, and be available equally to king and commoner. It was necessary for every one to know his own duty (Dharma) as well as of those with whom he had to live. It is not permissible to remain quiet and inactive when gross violations of Dharma take place. On kings and those who represent them in administration a more direct responsibility is devolved to see that every one does his appointed duty and does not violate those of others. The Dharma of the King (i.e., of the State, in modern phraseology) is two-fold: first, those which concern the Ruler as an individual, and spring from his varṇa (caste) and stage of life (Ās'rama); secondly, it includes everything that an anointed king (abhiṣikta) must do.[1] The latter is termed Rājadharma. This again has a wider and a narrower sense. In the narrower, it comprehends all that a king (i.e., the State) has to do or refrain from doing in the way of administration, including questions of policy, which lie on the borderland of Arthas'āstra and Dharmas'āstra. In the broader sense, Rājadharma is all-inclusive: it comprehends every one's Dharma, which it is the business of the King to know and enforce. It is in this sense that the Mahābhārata declares that all Dharma is comprehended in Rājadharma.[2] The duty of an ancient Indian king was not held to be limited to police, protection and tax-collection. The "protection" that a king confers on his subjects is not restricted to security from violations of personal liberty and property rights. It is not exhausted by the addition of the function of economic development of the people and kingdom. The king (i.e., the State is as responsible for the ultimate spiritual welfare of the people as for their material well-being. The education, discipline, protection and support of the entire population, into each must be safeguarded by the king. The responsibility of the king is comprehensive, absolute and personal. It cannot be shifted or shared. Those who work under the king as judges, for instance, have both a civil and a moral or spiritual responsibility for discharging their duties properly. They are liable for punishment by the state and post-mortuary punishments are indicated for them also.[1] But, if a judge is corrupt or unjust, his liability and punishment will not save the king from liability for the miscarriage of justice. As superior and supervisor he has the responsibility. Seasonal vicissitudes, epidemics, natural calamities and accidents by flood and fire,[2] and anything outside the order of nature such as the mortality of children before parents, to take an extreme case from the Rāmāyaṇa,[3] are the consequences of regal neglect of the paramount duty of supervision, guidance and control and of the social misfit that results therefrom. The intricate nature of the questions put, for instance, by S'rī Rāma to Bharata, indicate and illustrate this responsibility.[4] In Indian theory there is no such doctrine as "the king can do no wrong." Ministerial responsibility is only to the king, and for every decision the king alone is responsible in the last resort. Good government (Rāmarājyaṁ, Dharmarājya) reproduces the Golden Age (Kṛta-yuga) and bad government the Age of Iron (Kaliyuga). The king makes the age, i.e., is responsible for the atmosphere and moral colour of the epoch. It is this that is enforced by the famous statement of the Mahābhārata that the king is the maker of Kāla or Time (Rājā kālasya kāraṇam).[5] It is not a charter of regal absolutism but of regal subordination to enjoined Dharma. The epics delight to illustrate the effect of righteous rule on the complexion of the age, by stories. Rukmāṅgada's concern for enforcing fasts on haridina (the eleventh day of a lunar fortnight) on all his subjects sprang from his feeling of responsibility for their ultimate salvation. King Arjuna of the Haihayas earned the title of Kārtavīrya by his vigilance in securing the strict conformity to duty, in thought as well as in action, by all his subjects, which made him reproduce in his kingdom the conditions of the long-past Golden Age (Kṛta-yuga).[1] Many kings, even in Greater India, took the title of Dharma Mahārājas,[2] implying that they were upholders of Dharma in everyday administration. It was the duty of the king (i.e., the State) to be conversant with the Dharma of every one, so as to bear properly the heavy burden (mahāntam bhāram) of regal responsibility.[3] The exposition of Rājadharma by Bhīṣma (Sāntiparva, ch. 55 ff.) is prefaced by a request to the latter by the former, who is filled " with the awful sense of his new responsibility." Rājadharma is the last refuge (parāyaṇam) of the entire world of living beings. Trivarga is entwined (samāsakta) in Rājadharma. Mokṣadharma (caturtha-varga) is made clear, as everything else is by it. What reins are to horses, what the elephant-goad is to the elephant, that the Dharma of the king (narendra-dharma) is to the people, who have to be controlled by him (to keep them on the safe road).[4] Rājadharma involves more than a knowledge of the duties of the castes and orders (varṇās'rama-dharma) : that ruler alone can be called a master of Dharma (dharmavit), who frames his code of conduct after an investigation of the laws of castes, of the by-laws of guilds and clans, and of peculiar customs of clans (kuladharma).[1] Ignorance will not exonerate a king: it is his duty to find out his Dharma. The protection of the subjects and the destruction of enemies by a king is possible only when he knows what is duty and what is its opposite.[2] The Brāhmaṇa, who might be called on to participate in a decision by a pariṣad on doubtful points of Dharma has to be conversant with its principles. It is for this reason that Manu indicates the importance of the study of his work to the twice-born generally.[3] But, as emphasized by Yudhiṣṭhira in the course of his interrogation by Yakṣa (yakṣa-pras'na, Vanaparva, chs. 314, 319) the secret of Dharma is hidden in the cave (of the human heart), reasoning is inconclusive, Vedic texts conflict with one another, there is no one sage whose opinion is decisive, and one is driven to follow the path of the great (mahājana).[4] S'rī Rāma, when upbraided by Vāli the monkey-king, for slaying him, defends the action on the ground that the entire earth, with its mountains, jungles and forests belonged to the Ikṣvāku family, and that it was the duty of the kings of the line to restrain from wrong-doing (a-dharma) not only human beings but even birds and beasts in the empire. The duty lay on Bharata as ruler, and those like him were only carrying out the duty on the ruler's behalf.[5] An elder brother, was in law, equal to a father and a younger to a son; the wife of a younger brother was like a daughter-in-law.[6] Vāli, by taking possession of the wife of his younger brother Sugrīva, had violated the law.[1] S'rī Rāma, as Bharata's deputy, was not competent to overlook the offence and refrain from punishing Vāli.[2] The penalty for incest was death.[3] Vāli himself must recognize that submission to the penalty for his crime was for his spiritual benefit: for, Manu had laid down that an offender, who had undergone the appointed penalty for his crime at the king's hands, goes to heaven. A thief escapes whether punished or let go by the king; only in the latter case the guilt adheres to the king who had neglected his duty.[4] The justification for the killing of Vāli is made to rest on debatable propositions, and has been regarded by some critics as casuistical. For the purpose of its illustrating a well-recognized responsibility in a king to see that every one within his jurisdiction, irrespective of place or position, is punished for violation of Dharma, it is relevant. Belief in S'rī Rāma being an incarnation of the Supreme Being would have closed the mouths of critics in ages in which this belief was universal in the land.

In ages in which kings and ministers, as well as common folk were conversant with their respective duties and Dharma generally, a statement of Dharma in all its aspects and divisions was not so necessary as it becomes in a decadent age, when even kings were of dubious descent and were usually not kṣatriyas. To such persons guidance in regard to what was traditionally and under scriptural authority regarded as Dharma was necessary, and it was equally so for their degenerate subjects. This is the reason for the stimulus given to recapitulations of Dharma in authoritative works in the reigns of rulers of dubious birth. After the S'āka invasions, and even in the days of the decline of the Mauryan empire we notice how members of new or foreign dynasties are very zealous in the performance of the great Vedic sacrifices like the Rājasūya, As'vamedha and Vājapeya sacrifices. Puṣyamitra as a Brāhmaṇa, had no right to a throne but he perfomed an As'vamedha. Kharavela, a Jaina, king, claims to have performed both an As'vamedha and a Rajasūya. Gautamīputra S'atakarṇi even claims the title of a Brāhmaṇa. A widowed queen Nāyanikā, the consort of S'atakarṇi I, claims to have performed (or participated in) many As'vamedhas and Rājasūyas. Samudragupta, Kumāragupta and Ādityasena, among the non-Kṣatriya Gupta kings, performed the As'vamedha. The Bhāras'ivas and the Vākāṭakas make similar claims. The Kṣatriya lineage of the Cālukyas is more than questionable; and yet Pulakesin I did a horse-sacrifice. In South India, the early Pallava king S'ivaskandavarman claims to have performed all the three great sacrifices.[1] It is not unlikely that the rivalry in performing such great sacrifices by non-Kṣatriya kings, lies behind the interdiction of the As'vamedha in the Kaliyuga, in the kalivarjya texts.[2]

The zeal of the new dynasts for showing their love of Ārya Dharma shows itself in other ways also. One of the most signal is the competition in producing authoritative expositions of Dharma under their patronage or in their names. Govindacandra, who commissioned the composition of the Kṛtya-Kalpataru, was only the third ruler of the new Gāhadvāla dynasty of Kanauj, whose power reached its meridian only late in his reign. The Mitākṣarā owes its composition to his elder contemporary, the Cālukya Vikramāditya VI, 1076-1127 A.D. Hemādri's colossal digest, which was to expound all the four puruṣārthas was prepared under the command of another member of a new dynasty.[3] Like the great commentaries on the Vedas, the bhāṣya on Parās'arasmṛti was composed by Mādhavācārya, under orders of a S'ūdra king of the newly established kingdom of Vijayanagar.[1] In later times, the preparation of a dharma nibandha under the patronage of a minor chief is obviously designed to secure a fame that his political insignificance could not obtain for him (e.g., the Bundela Bīr Singh, who commissioned the Vīramitrodaya or the Sengara chief who got Nīlakaṇṭha Bhaṭṭa to prepare the Mayūkha). Digests written by scholars, without patronage, spring up in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in and around Kās'i. They are due to the pre-eminence that the scholar-world of the holy city had come to attain in the Hindu mind, and the habit of referring all doubtful points in Dharma to decisions (vyavasthā) by the paṇḍits of Benares.

LAKṢMĪDHARA'S PREDECESSORS

It was in such circumstances that the Kṛtya-Kalpataru came to be composed. In Hindu mythology, there are three donors of untold wealth, the source of all that is attractive and to be wished for. These are the Ocean (Mahārṇava), the Celestial Cow, Kāmadhenu, with whose help the sage Vasiṣṭha was able to feast Vis'vāmiṭra's hosts in the forest,[2] and the Eternal Tree of Paradise, Kalpataru, which gives to every one all that he craves for. The selection of the name of one of these for a comprehensive statement of Dharma, which will solve all doubts and answer all questions on Dharma, is naturally dictated to an ambitions and self-conscious author. Lakṣmīdhara, in the verses prefixed to Brāhmacārikāṇḍa, refers to three preceding nibandhas, which his own work excelled : viz., the Mahārṇava, the Kāmadhenu and Ratnamālā. It was natural that since the names of two out of the three wish-yielding sources had been appropriated as titles by two predecessors that he should choose the third, viz. Kalpataru as the title of his own work. Ratnamālā, from its title, could also be an appropriate title to a digest, which collects the gems (ratna) of Dharma dicta, and strings them up in a necklace (mālā). He also alludes to a contemporary and friend Gopāla, as having made a digest in prose. MM. P. V. Kane, on the strength mainly of a paronomastic verse of Caṇḍes'vara[1] regards Gopāla as the author of the Kāmadhenu. Caṇḍes'vara refers to and occasionally cites a digest named Prakās'a, which MM. P. V. Kane would identify with the Mahārṇava, but the conclusion is debatable.[2] The word Prakās'a has not the appropriateness of the three other words to describe an encyclopaedic dharma-nibandha. Caṇḍes'vara knew Lakṣmīdhara's deference to the Mahārṇava, which is placed even before the Kāmadhenu in his enumeration and if it was the same work as the Prakās'a (as suggested by Mr. Kane) he would have used the name by which Lakṣmīdhara refers to it. His own selection of the word Ratnākara (i.e., the ocean, mahārṇava) as the title of his own work is in line with the selection of the three other titles. In a verse, which is obviously modelled on verses 12-13 in the introductory verses of the Brahmacārikāṇḍa, Caṇḍes'vara refers to his own work as excelling three digests, viz., the Kāmadhenu, the Kalpataru and the Pārijāta.[3]

[1] Mādhava was minister of Bukka I (1354-1379) of Vijayanagara, who is referred to as Bukkaṇa-kṣmāpatiḥ.

[2] Mahābhārata, Ādiparva, 191, 6-17.

In the Kṛtyaratnākara (p. 619) he cites a half-verse of Jābāla from "Smṛti-Mahārnava-prakās'a." In the Vivādaratnākara he quotes the Prakās'a thrice and Prakās'a-kāra twice. The Kalpataru is similarly cited under the captions of Lakṣmīdhara (five times), Kalpataru (seven times) and Kalpatarukāra (once). Vijñānes'vara is cited under the name of Mitākṣarākāra (twice) and Mitākṣarā (once) in the same work. It is not clear that Mahārṇava, Prakās'a and Mahārṇavaprakās'a are identical, as held by MM. P. V. Kane. In the Brahmacārikāṇḍa (inf. p. 134) a well-known verse of Manusmṛti (V, 139) is quoted as from the Mahārṇava. It is not clear why such a source should be stated by Lakṣmīdhara who had Manusmṛti at his fingers' ends. Had it been a verse ascribed to Manu but not found in the standard redaction, the citation would have meaning. Readers are liable occasionally to mark in the text of manuscripts their own findings of alternative sources of citations. Sometimes, the uncritical habit leads to the importation into the text of an older author extracts from a later writer. That this is the source of the supposed citation by the Kṛtya-kalpataru (Vyavahārakāṇḍa) of the views of Vijñanes'vara, stressed by MM. P. V. Kane (Hist. of Dharmas'āstra, I, pp. 289-290) and of the Prakās'a and Pārijāta (ib. p. 306) as well as of Halāyudha (ib. p. 292) has been explained in my Introduction to the Dānakāṇḍa, and the evidence from the manuscripts has been again reviewed in the Vyavahārakāṇḍa (pp. 248 and 397). Reasons have been adduced to show that the Mitākṣarā should have been composed sometime after the Kṛtya-kalpataru. Among distinguished writers Dhāres'vara was definitely earlier than Lakṣmīdhara, but the Kṛtya-kalpataru contains no reference to or citation from the former. In the light of the available evidence, it is right to conclude that the Kṛtya-kalpataru is almost the earliest nibandha, as it is the earliest extant, and that it owes little to the work of similar workers. One can sense this in the prefatory verses of Brahmacārikāṇḍa. It is doubtful if the three earlier digests named were like it complete pictures of Dharmas'āstra, judging from the very rare citations from them in later works. For originality of design and thoroughness in carrying it out, Lakṣmīdhara merits credit as for his success in completing a stupendous task.

DHARMAS'ĀSTRA'S BACKGROUND

The subject of Dharmas'āstra is the regulation of man's conduct. Its aim is thus practical. Among sentient beings, man alone is gifted with imagination and vision, reason and judgment, memory of the past and capacity to visualize the future and the will to act consciously and purposively in obedience to his convictions. Even conduct that comes to him traditionally must be based on features which appeal to reason.

A philosophy of life must lie behind his scheme of conduct. Individual and social action are brought within the ambit of philosophy by the hypothesis or belief in the divine creation of social order, and of the entire universe. In India metaphysics and sociology are intertwined. The orthodox systems of Indian philosophy (dars'ana) and Dharmas'āstra agree in fundamentals; the dars'anas prove or try to establish what the smṛtis accept as hypotheses. Both predicate the ultimate authority of s'ruti (i.e., the Veda) and the value of organized dialectic. They are complementary, not antagonistic. The smṛtis deal with the metaphysical basis of human relations, while the dars'ana treatises cite smṛtis. In a theistic system, ethics must be based on metaphysics. This is the reason why the atheist, nāstika, and the derider of the Veda (which is the ultimate authority for both philosophy and ethics) are condemned by Dharmas'āstra. The ordinances of conduct spring from s'ruti and smṛti; every dvija who, relying on the institutes of dialectics ignores these two sources of Dharma must be cast out of society as an atheist and a caviller of the Veda.'[1] (Manu, II, 11). Buddhists and Jains, who, while following the Hindu code of conduct generally, reject the authority of the Veda, are treated as atheists. Atheism involves loss of caste (XI, 67). Writers on Dharms'āstra, like the smṛtis, recognize the underlying unity behind the dars'anas or philosophical schools and accept what is common, and do not treat dissent between them as marks of unorthodoxy.[2] The point has been dealt with more fully in the Introduction to Mokṣakāṇḍa.[3] Smṛtis deal with problems which are regarded as religious and philosophical but usually briefly. Except where it is demanded by the context, nibandha writers like Lakṣmīdhara take for granted the fundamental philosophical beliefs on whose basis the exposition of Dharma proceeds. They do not expatiate on such fundamental concepts as karma, saṁs'āra, puruṣārtha, mukti, and the eschatological theories of the course of the ātman released from the body by death, through the paths of light and darkness to worlds in which they enjoy or suffer, according to their past karma, till they return to life again in new bodies.[1] They are all taken for granted, as matters within the belief of their readers. Manusmṛti aims at being a saṁhitā, a complete, self-contained statement of Dharma. It gives brief accounts, accordingly, of cosmology, including the creation (or evolution) of the universe and all its contents, material and immaterial, (Book I, 1-110), the relation of the Self to the selves (paramātman to jivātman) and of matter to spirit, the nature and effect of karma on rebirth (saṁsāra) in different forms (XII, 40-49), the creation of Time and its divisions (I, 24), the ages of the world (I, 68-73, 81-86) or Manvantaras and the Yugas, their features, and the ultimate attainment of release from rebirth or the fetters of karma (mokṣa). The moral order so created includes the division of human beings into four varṇas (castes) and the assignment of specific duties or functions to each of them, the former being detailed in the Puruṣasūkta (Ṛg-veda, X, 90).[2] Though not stated so explicitly by Manu, it must be held to include to caturvarga-puruṣārtha, or the four-fold aims of existence, namely Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa, of which the three first (trivarga) are designed to secure the fourth.

Smṛti philosophy conceives the Supreme Being as one, eternal, uncreated, self-existent, immanent, transcendent, omnipotent, omniscient, the abode of all auspicious qualities or attributes, the source and the goal of all selves,—in short, the saguṇa-Brahman of the Vedānta. The evolution and involution of cosmos, (sṛṣti and pralaya) in all its detail, are of His will. The natural laws that enable the universe to function are of His will also. He created the first Manu, who in turn created the ten Prajāpatis, and they created the seven other Manus. The Manus are in succession regents of the world, and are all immortal. Every fresh creation repeats the features of the preceding, and whatever course of action (karmāṇi) was assigned at creation to any kind of being is its in every successive creation. THE PURUṢĀRTHAS

The doctrine of the aims or ends of life as consisting in the quartette, dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa is the central theme of Hindu ethics. A distinction is made there between immediate and proximate, as well as lower and higher ends. A gradation in value is implied between the last three, the first (Dharma) being assumed as the regulator, the setter of the standard of all conduct, to which the pursuit of artha and kāma must conform. It furnishes the norm of the World. The famous exclamation of Vyāsa, at the very end of the Mahābhārata[2]—an epic teaching Dharma by precept and illustration, that artha and kāma have their source in Dharma, implies more than the affirmation of the superiority of Dharma to the other two: it means that consistent pursuit of Dharma or righteous ends, is not opposed to the pursuit of the material requisites of well-being (artha) and the satisfaction of legitimate desire (kāma) including the sex urge and aesthetic ideals. By asking why in the circumstances, Dharma is not universally followed, Vyāsa implies that Dharma will not bar a person from enjoying life in lawful ways, and restrict him to an ascetic and joyless existence. Hedonism has a place in ethics. The pursuit of worldly aims and of pleasure by itself will not only not bar the approach to emancipation (mukti), but if made in proper ways, may facilitate it. It is in this spirit that domestic life is praised in Dharmaśāstra. An ascetic life, because of the discipline of body and mind necessary for the concentration of the mind on the ultimate reality that it helps to secure, is prescribed in the first and last stages of life. But real capacity to focus one's thoughts on the Supreme comes of experience of life born of enjoying it. The bane of the poor is poverty. Indigence, which looks like involuntary asceticism, will deaden the feelings, instead of disciplining them. It is in this sense that Kauṭilya, as the exponent of the science of Artha (economics and politics), claims that the satisfaction of both Dharma and Kāma spring from Artha (well-being).[1] The relative values of the elements of trivarga have been debated from the earliest times; but, as declared by Manu, who refers to the controversies, the course is to aim at all three, but to give primacy to Dharma, and give up pleasure of wealth if they conflict with Dharma. (II, 224).[2]

In the Hindu view ascetic attitude of despising sense or aesthetic gratification, in legitimate ways, is not only not upheld, but is implicitly disapproved by the advocacy of the cultivation of the three aims, without mutual conflict. This is also the view of Kauṭilya and of Vātsyāyana, who, from the standpoint of specialists in artha and kāma might be expected to uphold their own special aim. Kauṭilya takes the rational view that a righteous life and one which finds scope for legitimate pleasures is possible only from artha, the material requisites of well-being. Vātsyāyana, though specializing on kāmas'āstra declares that the three are arranged in the order of preference, dharma standing first, artha next, and kāma coming last.[3] His standpoint is that even for the attainment of ultimate freedom (mukti or mokṣa), the extinction of all desire and a life of pleasurelessness is unnecessary.[4] Dharma is the regulator, and furnishes the standard for the pursuit of artha and kāma. The Mahābhārata ends with Vyāsa's famous lament that he had wandered about and preached that both artha and kāma sprang from dharma, and yet Dharma is not served by any one. The purpose of Dharmas'āstra (like Vyāsa's great epic) is to vindicate the importance of Dharma and teach its precepts, so that the ultimate purpose of all existence might be served by the attainment of freedom from rebirth, and the return of ātman to its original abode, by those who scrupulously follow its injunctions. In the cosmic plan revealed by the divine order, the best for every one was to be attained by the pursuit of appointed or enjoined duty, i.e., Dharma for which the ultimate source and authority rest in the eternal veda.

THE CONCEPT OF DHARMA

A correct idea of what is implied by Dharma is demanded in an exposition of Dharma (Dharmas'āstra). But the term has eluded definition because there is no perceptibility (pratyakṣa) in it. It has to be determined by inference and by effects. The position was made clear by Āpastamba (p. 6) : " Dharma and A-dharma do not go about saying : ' Here we are.' Nor do the gods, Gandharvas and the Manes declare ' This is Dharma, this is A-dharma.'[1] The logician conceived it as innate property (guṇa) and even in that sense regarded it as invisible (a-pratyakṣa) and as cognizable only by inference.[2] The Mīmāṁsaka definition of Dharma is ' a desirable result (artha) defined by an injunction (codanā).[3] The Vais'eṣika definition is " that is Dharma from which results prosperity (abhyudaya) and beatitude (nis'-s'reyas).[4] The first bases the concept on source and effect, and the second only on effect. The source is, according to Mīmāṁsa, the Veda. Etymologically, Dharma would imply ' what holds things together or what upholds or supports ; ' and taken in a religious or ethical sense, it will mean what upholds the universe or society or keeps it from disintegrating. This sense will roughly suit the aim of Dharma in ordinary life, and will roughly mean morality. Sanskrit has no word for ' religion ' and Dharma is used as its nearest equivalent. This usage goes back to the Veda, where in the plural it has signified 'religious ordinances' or 'religious rites.'[1] In the Veda it is also used in the sense of an ordinance or injunction. From such usage, we pass in Vedic literature to effect in creating 'spiritual merit' as its mark, which brings it near the Mīmāṁsa and Vais'eṣika concepts.[2] In other Vedic passages, it is used to signify the corpus of religious duties or a specific duty imposed on a person in virtue of his position.[3] By extension, it came to be applied normatively to standards and ideals of conduct. The later definitions that sought to base Dharma on the conduct of the virtuous or the élite or on conscience are on a par with the definitions that place Dharma outside the field of cavil or question among believers by specifying a Vedic source for it. But the Vedic canon contains dicta that relate to rites or actions that offend humanity or conscience, like the S'yena sacrifice for destroying an enemy. Mitramis'ra avoids the risk of defining Dharma by mere citation of Vedic authority (s'ruti-pramāṇa) by defining it as "that which, while not being conducive to evil, is known from the Vedas to be conducive to good."[4] As Dharma relates to conduct or action, the ancient definitions have based it on intuition, conscience, behaviour and scriptural sanction as well as on its beneficial reaction on the doer, society and the cosmic order.

LAKṢMĪDHARA'S APPROACH TO THE CONCEPT OF DHARMA

In the initial chapter in which he discusses the scope of Dharma (dharmanirṇaya), Lakṣmīdhara prefaces his consideration with the statement that the determination of Dharma is helpful in its application in daily life, by consideration of its nature (svarūpa), effect (phala), sanction (pramāṇa) and occasion (nimitta) or use. And he devotes a subsection to each of these headings.

NATURE OF DHARMA (DHARMASVARŪPA)

He begins with Manu's exordium asking his auditors to listen to his exposition of Dharma, which Manu qualifies by describing it as that "which is based on the constant practice of persons learned in the Veda, who are morally good, and devoid of aversion and attachment to the world, and whose conscience sanctions it." The test of Dharma is its inspiring the conduct of trained and orthodox men, of blameless character. He follows up this indication by defining Dharma as that which Āryas, who are masters of the Veda, commend (Vis'vāmitra and Āpastamba). What they condemn is a-dharma. Dharma is good (s'reyaḥ) because it brings about prosperity (abhyudaya). The definitions anticipate the later indication of the sources and sanctions of Dharma.

KINDS OF DHARMA

Dharma being enjoined duty, its differentiation becomes possible by reference to those occasions to which it would apply. The ordinary division of Dharma is five-fold : relating to caste (varṇadharma), ās'rama or stage of life (ās'ramadharma), the combination of varṇa and ās'rama, function (guṇa-dharma) and occasion (naimittikadharma). There is a cross division of ās'ramadharma in three parts : distinctive, special and general. All have their sanction in the Veda (vedamūlaḥ). Vedic rites are of two kinds : sacrifices (iṣṭā), gifts, consecrations and public utilities (pūrta). The former confers enjoyment in Heaven, while the latter grants both enjoyment and emancipation (bhukti-muktipradam).[1] The distinction is obviously based on the first being aimed at benefit for one person, while the second inures to the public advantage and is therefore spiritually more efficacious.

The enjoined duties of the varṇas are indicated next (p. 8). Teaching and learning the Veda, sacrificing for oneself and for others, receiving and making gifts are the duties of the Brāhmaṇa-varṇa. Sacrifice, learning the Veda, making gifts and protection of the people as well as avoidance of addiction to sensual pursuits constitute the Dharma of the Kṣatriya; the rearing of cattle, making gifts and sacrificing and studying the Veda are the duties of the Vais'ya in addition to practising trade, agriculture and lending money. To the S'ūdra the Lord (Prabhuḥ) assigned only one duty, viz., of unquestioning service to the three other castes (p. 9). The actions of the varṇas are to be characterized by different qualities. Mental calm, self-restraint, austerity, purity, peace of mind, honesty, wisdom and discrimination are those of the first varṇa: courage, bearing, self-possession, driving power (dākṣyam), not turning the back in battle, liberality, and a commanding disposition are the ideals of the second caste. To every one, the following of his own enjoined duty or occupation (svadharma) is best, even though it may not bring him manifest avantage; adoption by one of the duties of other castes is the cause of ruin.[1] In a planned society, no one should have freedom to give up his own duties or take up those of others. It is a matter of social discipline.

[1] Muṇḍakopaniṣad (1, 2, 11) grants only abhyudaya to them, not mukti.

GENERAL DUTIES : HINDU ETHICAL CODE

The dharma of every one involves a catalogue of virtues of both a personal and a communal nature. Personal virtue has itself a social reaction. But all action should be so oriented as to proceed on the principle of treating others as one would like to be treated; wish good for others as for oneself, and avoid harm to them as for oneself. (p. 14) The essence of righteousness (dharmasarvasvam) lies in this rule: do no harm to others. The list will show the moral elevation of Dharmas'āstra, and the illustrative explanations of qualities is even more significant of it.

They extend the scope of the moral qualities specified. The catalogue contains the names of about 32 virtues including truthfulness, mercifulness, patience, self-control, purity of body and mind, refraining from cruelty (ahiṁsā), humility, modesty, earnestness, equanimity, non-attachment to wealth, liberality, unenviousness, uprightness, joyousness (maṅgalam) and good conduct generally. The list is not exhaustive and is only illustrative. The 'general' dharma applies to all castes and both sexes. Gautama enjoins the S'udra to be meek, truthful and pure (X, 61).[1] It is noteworthy that Lakṣmīdhara has not cited the famous verse of Manu (X, 63) [2] declaring the duties common to all the varṇas to be ahiṁsā, satyam, asteyam (not taking wrongful possession of another's property), purity (s'aucam) and control of the senses, but an almost identical statement of Hārīta is cited in the parva on yama-niyama in Gṛhasthakāṇḍa (p. 303).[3] What was the common moral obligation of every one was so well-known that it was unnecessary to quote for it every authority. It will be interesting to compare the list with that to be gathered from the edicts of As'oka: viz., compassion, liberality, truth, purity, gentleness, peace, joyousness, saintliness and self-control.[4] The implication is that Dharma stands for a complete code of high morality, and can be equated with 'morality' in the widest sense.

[1] श्रेयान्स्वधर्मो विगुणः परधर्मात्स्वनुष्ठितात् । स्वधर्मे निधनं श्रेयः परधर्मो भयावहः ॥ (भगवद्गीता, ३, ३५ ; १३, ८-११)

THE FRUIT OF DHARMA

From the fruit will the tree be judged; and from the effect of activities, both mundane and trans-mundane, it will be possible to decide whether they are consistent with Dharma or not. Briefly, he who stands firm in activities enjoined by s'ruti and smṛti earns fame in this life, and such bliss as is justified by his karma after death (Manu, II, 9). Karma has a double reward: it determines the self's sojourn in good or bad worlds, according to its nature till the good accruing from it is exhausted or the evil springing from bad action is expiated by post-mortuary suffering, and then according to its quality, it determines the kind of birth and the varṇa, which at the end of the period of post-mortuary experience the reincarnating self attains. (Gautama, XI, 31-32). The idea is elaborated in the citation from Āpastamba (p. 15) which shows how as the tree is determined not only by the seed but by the soil in which it is planted, so good and bad Karma affect future births, as well as happiness or misery in heaven and hell respectively. By performing obligatory duties one obtains longevity, desired offspring, and wealth in abundance and loses bodily marks that indicate past lapses (p. 16). Those who perform rites for the sake of obtaining desired ends, get them after death, but after the merit is exhausted, they reincarnate, but those who do Dharma for its own sake, and not for gain, reach worlds from which there is no return (p. 16). The person who neglects his duties or acts against them obtains ill-fame, misfortunes and a diseased body (p. 17). Merely acting in a manner to get pleasure only out of it leads only to Hell (Āpastamba, p. 17). The performance of enjoined duties (Dharma) averts misfortune or mitigates its rigour, and has appropriate fruit (p. 17). Acting on one's own initiative, without understanding its sanction, is fruitless like the play of children (p. 18). Do not act for worldly advantage only; it will not lead to permanent bliss (Āpastamba). The consequences of omitting to perform appointed duties, and acting contrary to religious injunction have both immediate results in misfortune, (Manu, IV, 171) to those who so act. Life as man furnishes a ladder by which one may ascend to Heaven by doing righteous actions. Do not neglect duty through love of pleasure, or through fear, or through cupidity or even for preserving life (Mahābhārata). Dharma, according to the Veda, is most to be desired, for all good is rooted in it. Dharma is the supporter of the Universe, and it is the righteous person who has good offspring in.

DETERMINATION OF DHARMA FROM ITS SANCTION (PRAMĀṆATAḤ)

The quality of Dharma springs from its source or sanction. Manu derives Dharma on four sources: the entire (akhila) Veda, i.e., the four Vedic saṁhitās and their Brāhmaṇas, the tradition of the virtuous who are expert in the Veda, the practice of the holy, and self-satisfaction. Lakṣmīdhara in confining the sanction of the Veda to injunctive and prohibitory parts of s'ruti, follows the lead of Mīmāṁsa of the Prabhākara school, and rejects those parts of the Veda which consist of mantra (hymns), nāmadheyas (names) and arthavāda. The sole purpose of the Veda is held to be the commanding of acts (or prohibiting them) and all else is unobligatory. The position has been disputed, but is apparently that held by Lakṣmīdhara. The persons, whose memory of tradition constitutes a source of Dharma, must not only be grounded in the Veda, but they must possess the highest moral qualities, whose enumeration indicates how exceptionally eminent in virtue they must be, if their recollection of what Dharma is is to constitute the reason for accepting it as such. The collocation of Vedic learning and high morality excludes from the ranks of the expounders of Dharma the men, who are either not learned in the Veda or do not accept its authority, like the Buddhists. The expression smṛtis'īla contains two further implications: firstly, smṛtis embody Vedic tradition and are (as definitely stated by Yājñavalkya (I, 72) counted as the source next to the Veda, and their authors are persons of the highest character (s'īla). The good man (sādhu) is also the s'iṣṭa, i.e., he who excels by reason of training in the Veda. Thus a Vedic source exists (in this view) for not only all that is laid down in smṛtis but for the practice of good men, deeply learned in the Veda (s'iṣṭācāra). Mīmāṁsa applies two criteria to custom that will indicate Dharma: firstly, it must be the custom or practice of a person whose moral eminence and Vedic learning make him a s'iṣṭa; secondly, it must refer to the intention behind the practice; for, not all that a s'iṣṭa does can constitute Dharma, and only such of his acts as are done under the consciousness of performing a meritorious act (puṇyakarma) can be Dharma. Strictly speaking, a moral principle is not to be treated as Dharma, unless it is laid down in s'ruti, smṛti or s'iṣṭācāra. This will account for the citation of authority of smṛti or the Veda for virtues which are among the commonest ideals of humanity, in order to bring them under Dharma. What satisfies one's inner voice (ātmanastuṣṭi), in Manu's enumeration of the sanctions of Dharma, is further elaborated by Yājñavalkya as what is desired as contributing to one's own satisfaction (svasya priyam) but not opposed to the scriptures (s'āstrāviruddha) and as emanating from deliberate and virtuous resolution and not the impulse of the moment.

Among scriptural sources of Dharma, as distinguished from the subjective, fourteen are enumerated by Yājñavalkya as 'seats' of Dharma (Dharmasthānāni), an expression that Lakṣmīdhara interprets as "declaratory" (vyavasthāpakāni). They are the four Vedas, the six Vedāṅgas, Mīmāṁsa, Nyāya, Purāṇa and Dharmas'āstra. The Viṣṇupurāṇa counts the fourteen as vidyās, which it makes into eighteen by adding Āyurveda, Dhanurveda, Gāndharvaveda and Arthas'āstra. The last four are reckoned in the Caraṇavyūha as Upa-Vedas[1] attached to each of the four Vedas respectively. The designation as Upa-Veda grants them a canonical status. Lakṣmīdhara describes the first fourteen as devoted to the determination of Dharma (dharma-pramitim prati), while the last four, though indicating visible benefits (dṛṣṭa-pradhānaḥ) still become authorities for Dharma as they aim at some unworldly objectives (alaukikam artham pramāṇavantah). The list of sources is not closed with the eighteen. Sumantu adds to them itihāsa (the great epics as distinguished from the Purāṇas), as well as the customs of countries, (des'a), families, corporations, (gaṇa), sub-castes and castes, heretics and s'rotriyas. The inclusion of the Vedāṅgas like Grammar, Etymology, Phonetics, Metrics (chandas), jyautiṣa (astronomy) and kalpa (ritualistic treatises), is for the proper elucidation of the vidhi and niṣedha (injunctive and prohibitory passages) in the Veda. This is the reason for the inclusion of experts in Nirukta (etymology) in the pariṣad for the determination of doubtful points in Dharma. (inf., p. 35). The kalpasūtras, though mainly concerned with Vedic (s'rauta) and domestic (gṛhya) ritual, have at the end rules which relate to the ordinary conduct of persons (dharma), and are separately studied as Dharmasūtras. Modern critics regard every versified smṛti as based on a dharmasūtra, or aphoristic work on Dharma. Notwithstanding the inclusion of Dharmasūtra under kalpa, as a Vedāṅga i.e., adjunct to the Veda, the gṛhyasūtras and their paris'iṣṭas (appendices) are taken by Lakṣmīdhara as separate authorities like the Purāṇas (p. 25). He quotes extensively from the gṛhyasūtras and from the dharmasūtras of Āpastamba and Baudhāyana, which form the concluding sections of the kalpasūtras of those schools. The reference to the works of Vasiṣṭha, Viṣṇu and Gautama among the smṛtis is obviously to the dharmasūtras passing as those of these authors, and not (as in the case of Āpastamba and Baudhāyana) to the late redactions of their doctrines in metrical form, as S'loka-Āpastamba etc.

SMṚTI LITERATURE

The most direct, and the most accessible extant source of Dharma is the smṛti, which is accordingly described as 'Dharmas'āstra' by S'aṅkha-Likhita (p. 33). This is also stated by Manu (dharmas'āstram tu vai smṛtiḥ, II, 10). The term 'smṛti' in a literal sense as what has come down by memory, has been applied to all literature which is outside the Vedic canon. The restriction of it to Dharmas'astra has made it almost only that, and nothing else. The number of smṛtis extant exceeds ten dozens. There are enumerations of smṛtis in their own works by Yājñavalkya and Parās'ara, but they are not cited by Lakṣmīdhara. He contents himself with citing the list of twenty given by S'ankha-Likhita, which ends with the expression 'ādayah,' to indicate that many more exist, besides those enumerated, and another list furnished by Yama, obviously to illustrate their overlapping as well as to give names exclusively found in their own list. Lakṣmīdhara contents himself by explaining that the lists are not exhaustive, as indicated by the expression 'ādi' at the end of one of the lists, and illustrating it by mentioning himself sixteen additional names. He does not quote the enumeration of thirty-six smṛtis by Paiṭhīnisi, which is given by the Vīramitrodaya.[1]

This is probably what is alluded to in the verses of Bhaviṣyapurāṇa (cited on p. 24). Lakṣmīdhara would include under the thirty-six writers like S'ātātapa, Yājñavalkya, Vasiṣṭha, Manu, Hārīta and others, to whose names descriptive titles like Vṛddha, Yogi and Laghu are often prefixed in quotations. But many of the quotations from such writers are ~~not~~ to be found in the standard editions of their smṛtis, a fact that Lakṣmīdhara seems to overlook. Very often citations occur as "smṛtiḥ" without any name being given as that of the author of the passage. Mitramis'ra would acccept them as authoritative, but a work like Ṣaṭ-trimsanmatam, which professes to summarize the views of thirty-six smṛtis is not to be accepted, as some writers reject its authority.[1] The attitude is similar to that taken as regards the relative force of s'ruti and smṛti. While everything in a smṛti is held to be based on a Vedic source, it is secondary only, being a mere recollection of a Vedic injunction and as such inferior to a definite s'ruti passage on the same point.

[1] Paribhāṣā, p. 15.

The epics and Purāṇas contain large quantities of smṛti matter, some of which pass under captions like S'ivadharma, Viṣṇudharma etc. They are accepted as authorities by Lakṣmīdhara as included in the expression "Smṛtyantareṣu" in the Bhaviṣyapurāṇa passage (p. 25). His position is more logical than that of Aparārka, Vijñānes'vara, S'ūlapāṇi and others, who accept the authority of Ṣaṭ-triṁs'anmatam.

Smṛtis are divided into five categories according to their outlook: viz., those which deal with 'visible' i.e. worldly matters (dṛṣṭārthāḥ); those which deal with 'invisible' (unworldly) matters; those which deal with both; those based on reasoning or equity (nyāyamūlāḥ); and those which merely recapitulate what has been stated by the elect (s'iṣṭāḥ). The political portions of a smṛti like Manu's e.g. the six expedients, or ṣāḍguṇya and the four means (upāya) come under these which deal with visible results. Such portions have not absolute validity, while the others have it, because the latter have their source (by presumption) in the Veda (vedamūlāḥ).

THE PURĀṆAS

The classical number of the Purāṇas is eighteen, but as in the case of the smṛtis, variations may be seen in the enumerations. There are the mahāpurāṇas and the upa-purāṇas. Lakṣmīdhara gives the Viṣṇupurāṇa list (pp. 29-30). There is some variation in the lists of upa-purāṇas also. Lakṣmīdhara (p. 20) cites from the Matsyapurāṇa the account of five upa-purāṇas, viz. Nārasimha, Nandī, Sāmba, Āditya and Kālikā as parts of major purāṇas, and as such equally authoritative. He himself quotes four of these minor Purāṇas frequently along with Devīpurāṇa, another upa-purāṇa. Among the bigger purāṇas, he has used the following: Viṣṇu (but not Visṇudharmottara, like Mitramis′ra), Brāhma, Vāyu, Brahmāṇḍa, Mātsya, Varāha, Vāmana, Liṅga, Skānda, Pādma, Bhaviṣya and Mārkaṇḍeya. He quotes the Mahābhārata frequently and less often the Rāmāyaṇa. The six on which he does not draw are the Bhāgavata, Kūrma, Āgneya, Brahmavaivarta, Gāruḍa and the Nāradīya. In the Skāndapurāṅa he does not use (and probably did not know) the Kās′īkhaṇḍa. Lakṣmīdhara's readings differ widely from those in extant editions of the Purāṇas and epics, and many of his quotations are not discoverable in them. His digest will thus be helpful in determining the authenticity of their texts.

S′IṢṬĀCĀRA

Dharma, according to Vasiṣṭha, is what is enjoined in s′ruti and smṛti. In cases where no direction is available from either of these the authority is the practice of s′iṣṭas, i.e. persons, who are free from envy and conceit, are contented with the little they have, and are free from boastfulness, greed, infatuation and anger. The qualities suggested are such as are likely to influence the conduct of men, even if they are not learned in the Veda. With all these qualities they should be able to 'visualize' the Veda, as if they heard it instinctively. (p. 27) Vasiṣṭha adds two other qualifications to the s′iṣṭa: his goodness should be hereditary, and he should be a Brāhmaṇa. To such men the Veda is 'directly visible' (s′rutipratyakṣa). They should have both a knowledge of s′ruti and smṛti, but their faith in them must mould their daily conduct. Analogous to the direction of s′iṣṭas are the practices or customs of women of all castes, which may be regarded as the Dharma of the varṇas, not specified in s′ruti or smṛti, such as the use of māṅgalyasūtra for putting round the neck of brides in weddings, and the usage of S'ūdras of excellent conduct (sacchūdra) for their varṇa. As women and S'ūdras cannot obtain from the Vedas direct knowledge of rites, conduct and the nature of the Self, etc. the necessary knowledge and direction is provided for them in the epics and Purāṇas, to the recitation of which they might listen.[1]

The authority ascribed to s'iṣṭācāra does not entitle the wrongful actions of great sages or superhuman beings in the past, which constituted violation of Dharma. This is explicitly stated by Āpastamba: "Transgression of Dharma and violence are noticed in ancient sages, who, however, committed no sin involving misfortune owing to their lustre (tejas). But a man of latter times, who does the same things falls" (II, 13, 7-8). Through their power they escape contamination of sin, as the lotus leaf escapes wetting even in water. The gods drink liquor, the Siddhas rob one of wealth, but their action will not justify our doing so now (p. 28), eating or drinking what is forbidden, and coveting the possessions of others. We should neither follow nor condemn such super-men's actions (p. 28).

Kumārila in his Tantravārtika mentions thirteen illustrations from ancient legends of acts which were committed by persons of austerity or piety, which are contrary to Dharma. The list is not exhaustive, but is interesting.[2] They are: (1) Prajāpati committing incest with his own daughter Uṣas; (2) Indra seducing Ahalyā; (3) Nahuṣa, when he was Indra, trying to commit adultery with Indrāṇī; (4) Vasiṣṭha trying to commit suicide by throwing himself into a river, when overcome with grief for the loss of his sons: (5) Purūrava contemplating suicide on separation from Ūrvas'ī; (6) Yudhiṣṭhira marrying Draupadi, who had been won as vīrya-s'ulka by his younger brother; (7) Yudhiṣṭhira's telling a falsehood to Droṇa, his guru; (8) Vyāsa, though Naiṣṭhika-brahmacārin procreating sons by niyoga; (9) Vis'vāmitra acting as a purohita to Tris'aṅku, who had become a caṇḍāla; (10) Bhīṣma living without belonging to any of the four ās'ramas; (11) Rāma doing an as'vamedha without his wife; (12) S'rī Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna marrying cousins; (13) and the blind Dhṛtarāṣṭra performing yāgas. Kumārila does not regard these acts as precedents for excusing incest, adultery with a married woman, attempts at suicide, lying, breach of celibacy by a naiṣṭhika and for performing great sacrifices contravening the ritual enjoined for them and for marrying sapiṇḍas. He exercises great ingenuity in trying to explain the acts away. His attitude is significant as an affirmation of the binding nature of the Dharma, which was violated in each of these cases. A fourteenth instance, usually cited, is Vis'vāmitra's devouring dog's flesh, when overcome with hunger, offered by a caṇḍāla. The last instance is given along with three others by Manu (X, 105-108):[1] Ajīgarta offering to slay his own son S'unas'epa (Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, VII, 13-16), Vāmadeva's willingness, when overcome with hunger to eat dog's flesh, and Bharadvāja's acceptance of a gift of cows, when he was starving, from a carpenter. Manu defends these actions, not on the ground of the lustre (tejas) of such sages, as Āpastamba does, but on the ground that when faced with hunger or deep distress a Brāhmaṇa commits no sin, when he accepts food from any one, (X, 104)[2] or when he accepts gifts from or officiates in sacrifices for persons not qualified. (X, 103).[3] Medhātithi, in his comments on these verses, treats them as āpad-dharma, on the principle that dire necessity knows no law.[4]

Local Custom : How far Acceptable

Long standing usage of certain people or areas, which even the morally élite follow, are likely to be cited as precedents, even if they are opposed to Dharma, as understood generally. Thus, even in the days of Baudhāyana (6th century B.C.) in the northern countries of India (e.g. Kashmir or Sindh) the following condemned practices were allowed : selling wool, drinking rum, (sīdhupānam), trading in animals which have teeth in both jaws (e. g. horses, camels) soldiering and sea-voyages. The practices which offend received as Dharma in the South of India, which still prevail there, were eating in the company of one's wife or uninitiated boys (who are both regarded as equal to S'ūdras), eating stale food, and cross-cousin marriage, which being that of sapiṇḍas is interdicted by Dharma. Baudhāyana states that Gautama condemns the practices, but he himself holds that they are allowable in the areas in which they have prevailed, though they are to be rejected if practised elsewere (p. 29). Gautama's condemnation of the practices is inferential, as he only declares that only those Dharmas of countries, castes and families which are not opposed to the sacred records (āmnāyai aviruddhāḥ) are valid (Gautama, XI, 21). Baudhāyana's concluding words may mean either his own decision (vyavasthā) or may be his conception of the position of Gautama. MM. P. V. Kane takes it to be his own condemnation of both sets of local usages.[1] Lakṣmīdhara summarily rejects cousin marriages as opposed to Dharma (see Gṛhasthakāṇḍa, p. 7) which interdicts the marriage of sapiṇḍas. The passage does not make it clear, if these practices, will be allowable to immigrants and whether persons, who had followed them will be adjudged as violating Dharma if they continue the practice in other areas to which they migrate. The tendency has been to regard the relaxations referred to as both local and personal to those living in the localities or descended from the inhabitants of those areas. It may be noted that S'rī Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna (who are not southerners) are said to have married their cousins Rukmiṇī and Subhadrā, and Kumārila is at pains to prove that the brides were not really cousins and sapiṇḍas of their husbands.[1] Kumārila rejects the local usages mentioned by Baudhāyana as a-dharma.

[1] Hist. of D. S.*, II, p. 459.

DOCTRINE OF EKAVĀKYATVA

The Vedas constitute the exclusive source of Dharma. To say so is not to negative the existence of the other sources or roots of Dharma, which have been named, viz. Smṛti, Purāṇa, Itihāsa and S'iṣṭācāra; but all of them are ultimately based on the Veda. It is a doctrine of Mīmāṁsa that for every smṛti rule there is a Vedic source. It may be discovered by assiduous research. The great Mīmāṁsa writers like S'abara, Kumārila and Khaṇḍadeva have endeavoured to find in Vedic texts the sources of as many smṛti rules as possible. There is also the doctrine that where a smṛti rule cannot be traced to an existing Vedic text, its source must be held to be in a 'lost' Vedic text (utsanna-s'ruti). The defect of this doctrine is that it seems to be in conflict with the hypothesis of the eternal character of the Veda or s'ruti. As against this objection, it may be argued that the text whose existence is presumed from the smṛti rule, which has eluded discovery, is only lost to view but exists, and that the belief does not run counter to the eternal nature of the Veda. MM. P. V. Kane has collected, from Mīmāṁsa writers, a considerable number of Vedic passages which furnish the source of later smṛti rules of-doctrines; and they show that the belief is not based on mere fiction, or an unprovable assumption.[2] In the same way, customs of the elect are ultimately traceable to a smṛti text or to s'ruti; where no smṛti text can be readily found in support of a custom, it is held that it is a lost smṛti (lupta-smṛti), and ultimately from a lost s'ruti. The validity of a smṛti rule is based on its representing a s'ruti sanction. The validity of a custom is based on a double presumption: that it is based on a lost smṛti text, which in its turn is held to have been based on a s'ruti injunction. There is a chance of a smṛti text not representing with absolute accuracy a s'ruti dictum; there is a double chance of inaccuracy similarly in the case of a custom. The chances of error are minimized where the s'iṣṭa, whose usage is held as authoritative is one who is habituated to act in accordance with s'ruti and smṛti (s'ruti-smṛti-pratyakṣaka). Nevertheless, a smṛti text must be held superior to a s'iṣṭācāra, but a smṛti rule must be deemed inferior to a definite s'ruti text. Even in regard to s'iṣṭācāra time-honoured usage must be superior to one for which traditional support is wanting. This is the implication of the famous dictum of Manu (IV, 178) that the path of safety is that which has been trodden by one's father and grandfather. A novel practice started by a s'iṣṭa's conscience or instinct cannot have the force of tradition running in a family of s'iṣṭas.

The common basis of all authorities ultimately in the Veda established the doctrine of the concurrence of their dicta. Its implication is concurrence between one Veda and another, between Veda and smṛti, between smṛti and smṛti, and between s'iṣṭācāra and smṛti. One may go a step further and maintain, under this doctrine, that there must be harmony within the customs of all s'iṣṭas. But all texts whether of s'ruti or smṛti have equal validity as such. Vedic texts come under the categories of vidhi, (injunction), niṣedha (prohibition), mantra (hymn), nāmadheya (nomenclature) and arthavāda (praise, blame or explanation or narrative. The exclusive concern of the Vedas is held by Mīmāṁsakas to be Dharma. Their definition of Dharma is " that which is signified by an injunction (or prohibition) and leads to a benefit (or bad result)." The only operative portion of the Veda is that dealing with injunction (vidhi) and prohibition (niṣedha) and arthavādas have no independent authority. As the bulk of s'ruti consists of arthavāda, the relevancy in each arthavāda must be determined by its connection with a vidhi or niṣedha, without which it is ineffective. The Prabhākara school of Mīmāṁsa extend the theory of arthavāda's inoperativeness outside the s'ruti, e.g., smṛti, and treat many smṛti sayings as merely declamatory, or made for conveying stress. It is the quality of Dharma (according to Naiyāyikas) that it is associated with an invisible effect (apūrva), which endures till the attainment of the benefit (phala) contemplated by the act. A classification of texts in smṛtis into those with a visible result (dṛṣtārtha) and an invisible result (a-dṛṣṭārtha) makes the pursuit of artha and kāma, material prosperity and pleasure, the purpose of the former, and mokṣa (freedom) the aim of the latter. The second class is held more authoritative than the former. Adṛṣṭārtha smṛti is of two kinds: that which appeals to reason (nyāya-mūla) and common-sense, and finds its sanction therein, and that which finds its sanction in itself (vacanamūla). Of the two the first is inferior to the second, which corresponds to arthavāda. A similar division is into lokasiddha (demonstrable by worldly grounds) and Vedasiddha smṛtis. The arthas'āstra type of rules in smṛtis will be lokasiddha. In a conflict between the two, the Vedasiddha and Vacanamūla texts will prevail over the lokasiddha and nyāyamūla. Applying the idea innate in this distinction to ātmanastuṣṭi or samyak-samkalpajaḥ-kāmaḥ, the inexplicable promptings of instinct and conscience of a s'iṣṭa are superior to his reasoned conclusions. Reasoning may fail, like experience, but not instinct, in such a person. Most of the political sections of smṛti are lokasiddha and dṛṣṭārtha, e.g., the application of the principle of six guṇas (ṣāḍguṇya) the four expedients (catur-upāya), the appointment of officers, and the removal of "thorns" (kaṇṭaka). The prescription of evening prayers (sandhyā) and the prohibition of the eating of dog's flesh will be illustrations of adṛṣṭārtha rules. There are dicta which may come under both categories. Where the two types conflict, the adṛṣṭārtha prevails: where in the mixed type, there is conflict, an option (vikalpa) to follow either exists. If there is any matter in which there is scriptural sanction, which is wanting in smṛti, the sanction which is not stated in smṛti (anuktavādinī), should be acted on (inf. p. 31).

INTERPRETATION

In interpreting texts, particularly Vedic, one should, according to Manu, as explained by Lakṣmīdhara (p. 32) follow perception, inference (anumāna) and interpretation based on a proper understanding of the meaning of difficult expressions (s'abdam). The application of interpretation and reasoning which will not run counter to s'ruti and smṛti is alone right, in the determination of Dharma (Manu, XII, 105-106). The correct comprehension of Dharmas'āstra is the remedy for those whose minds are deluded by passion and anger (p. 33). The dvija is purified by a knowledge of Dharma as an earthen vessel is by fire (p. 33). The lamp of Dharmas'āstra lights the path of those who blindly struggle in the darkness of ignorance (ajñāna-timirāndha). The Vedas, smṛtis and the words of venerable men are authorities for Dharma. He who questions their authority (pramāṇa) is an evil person (durātman).

RESOLUTION OF POINTS IN DOUBT OR DISPUTE

Two ways of resolving doubts that one might feel are mentioned (p. 35): firstly, what Brāhmaṇas who are s'iṣtas say on matters that are in doubt or are unspecified should be followed (Manu, XII, 108); or, secondly what an assembly consisting of three or ten persons, who follow their duties faithfully (vṛttasthāḥ) should be accepted. (ibid., 110). Where there is an apparent discord between the authorities on any matter, i.e., between s'ruti, smṛti and the usage of the elect, a decision should be obtained by an assembly consisting of not less than ten students of the Vedas (p. 35).

The technical name for an assembly called to deal with such points of doubt or disputed matters is pariṣad. Its scope is strictly limited. It is for settlement of points on which there is an apparent conflict in authority. On matters on which there is unanimity among authorities, like for example marriage of persons of the same gotra, it is not competent to seek guidance from a pariṣad. This is made further clear by the rules for constituting the body. Three persons, each of whom is an expert in a Veda, a logician who will argue in a manner not to contravene the Veda, an expert in Mīmāṁsa, a student of Vedic exegis (nairukta), one who knows by heart the smṛtis (dharma-pāṭhakaḥ), one man each from each of the first three ās'ramas (i.e. a student, a house-holder and recluse) together constitute a pariṣad. (Manu, XII, 111). The composition of the assembly provides for representation of every type of requisite knowledge and experience in members of orthodox views. The mention of a member of the first ās'rama must be to a naiṣṭhika, in view of the nonage of the ordinary Brahmacārin. A member to represent the fourth Veda is mentioned by Vasiṣṭha, Yama and S'aṅkha-Likhitau. Mere acquaintance with the Veda or Dharmas'āstra is not enough; the members must be experts in them (praṇetāraḥ) who have the acknowledged ability to guide. The relative value attached to the qualifications is shown by making the opinion of even four or three experts in the Veda decisive, with or without an expert in smṛti. Such men are regarded by Vasiṣṭha as masters of Dharma lore (III, 7).[1] Mere expert knowledge of the Veda is not enough; they must also be agnihotrins who have become emaciated in body through performance of austerities (vrata). These must belong to the first varṇa alone, among those selected for Vedic learning. If agnihotrins are unavailable, five experts in Veda are required as a minimum (Aṅgiras). If only experts on expiation are needed, seven is the minimum number. For Mīmaṁsakas alone twenty-one is the minimum number. But one yati, who has mastered knowledge, is enough to constitute a pariṣad. The claim of maṭhādhipatis to give decisions on Dharma is based on this text of Aṅgiras.[2] The number must vary with the complexity or abstruseness of the matter to be decided and even a hundred members may be required for a pariṣad called to decide a matter of gravity and difficulty. The number is obviously suggestive only of the need for a fully representative expert body. Nominal Brāhmaṇas, devoid of the other necessary qualifications, cannot constitute a pariṣad; from number neither competence nor authority can be assured (p. 40). The number of members should be doubled for Kṣatriyas, trebled for Vais'yas, and quadrupled for S'ūdras (p. 41). The composition of the pariṣad is laid down so as to ensure the fullest consideration at the hands of a body of experts of approved orthodoxy and conduct, such as must command respect from every one.

RULES FOR DECIDING CONFLICTS OF AUTHORITY

The members of the pariṣad cannot decide as they please. Rules are laid down (though for experts in Mīmāṁsa they may be unnecessary) for their guidance (pp. 41-44). (1) Where two Vedic texts disagree on any matter, an option to follow either exists; in opposed authorities of equal weight, there must be an option. (2) Where a s'ruti injunction is in conflict with that of a smṛti, the Vedic rule decides. (3) Where two Vedic texts collide, a way-out must be sought to reconcile them by regarding them as applicable to different classes of cases. (4) A similar rule applies to a conflict between two smṛtis, but with this exception: viz., anything that contradicts Manu's dicta is to be rejected, for Manu's dicta are permeated by the Veda (p. 42), and the Veda has itself ruled that whatever Manu has declared is wholesome. (5) In a conflict between smṛti and arthas'āstra, the latter is over-ruled, as adṛṣṭārtha dicta prevail over dṛṣṭārtha. (6) In a conflict between two adṛṣṭārtha dicta, there is an option to follow either.

वेदव्रतेषु स्नातानामेकोऽपि परिषद्भवेत् ॥ (पराशरस्मृतिः, ८, २१)

From the hypothesis of the derivation of every rule of smṛti from a Vedic source, it is illogical to accept the possibility of any real conflict between s'ruti and smṛti rules in any matter. Kumārila, whom Lakṣmīdhara follows in this matter, therefore advises research to discover their application to cases where no real conflict will arise. Or, in the alternative, a lost s'ruti (utsannas'ruti) has to be presumed behind the smṛti dictum. It would be manifestly so in the case of a conflict between a rule of Manu and a s'ruti text, if found. Mitramis'ra (Paribhāṣā-prakās'a, p. 28) holds that this is not sound, as a definite gradation of values is recognized by Vyāsa between s'ruti, smṛti and Purāṇa. This gradation will be on the presumption of a secondary source not representing an ultimate source like s'ruti with precision.

The determination of authorities (pramāṇa) by those conversant with them, and the finding of their correct trend, are vital; for, when sources are obscure for matters which are difficult to settle, the resultant position for one who seeks guidance is deplorable (p. 44).

DETERMINANTS OF DHARMA

Lastly, the concept of Dharma has to be evolved from its determining factors in application (nimittataḥ) " Dharma must have reference to place, time, ceremony of ritual, (upāya), material (dravya), belief (s'raddhā), fitness of person involved and of surrender (tyāga)." Mitramis'ra interprets tyāga as a renunciation of proprietory right, as in a gift or dāna in this sūtra of S'aṅkha—Likhitau. Caṇḍes'vara explains how specific Dharmas arise for specific occasions and purposes, or with reference to mood in which it is done (e.g., s'raddhā or devoutness in s'rāddha). In regard to place, in the most generic sense, birth on the earth as a human being is itself the best opportunity for performing Dharma; for, it is only by a man that karma can be accomplished which will lead even to the highest end (p. 45). Within the earth, birth in Bhāratades'a is important, as it is the best part of karmabhūmi. For the performance of enjoined Dharma the ideal areas in the continent are next indicated, following various authorities, who appear to show a gradual widening of the area with the progress of time. In the (apparently) earliest definitions of the area in which the practice of the elect constitutes the norm, a narrow region (Brahmāvarta) is mentioned, which lies between the rivers Sarasvatī and Dṛṣadvatī; next to it in sanctity is the region of sages (ṛṣides'a) which embraces the region of Kurukṣetra, and the country of the Mātsyas, S'ūrasenas and Pāñcālas. Next comes the middle-country (Madhyades'a), extending from the Vinas'anā i.e., where the Sarasvatī loses itself in the sands to Prayāga (Allahabad), and from the Himalayas in the north to the Vindhyas in the south. A further expansion of this area so as to extend it from ocean to ocean makes it the abode of Āryas (āryāvarta). In descending order these areas are meritorious for obtaining from the practice of s'iṣṭas guidance to conduct. Shifting the criterion to areas which are fit for the performance of yajña, the area over which the black antelope (kṛṣṇasāra) moves freely is indicated for the purpose. As by this test the entire area of India from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, and from the Indus (Sindhu) to the river Vaitaraṇī, is the acceptable area. Those outside the limits are barbarian countries, unfit for yajña, and not Dharmades'a (p. 49). It is only within these limits that the twice-born (dvija) can find the scope for the discharge of their appointed religious duties (dharmasādhanaḥ). The twice-born should not live outside the area. The S'ūdra is free to live outside the limits if distressed for lack of subsistence (p. 47). Rites to propitiate the manes (s'rāddha) cannot be performed in a barbarian area (mlecchades'a); nor should a twice-born person go to it. By drinking water in such an area, one becomes like its (barbarian) inhabitants (p. 49). Viṣṇu supplies a further criterion: viz. the existence of the institution of four castes (cāturvarṇya). Where this is not found the area becomes barbarian. In the days of Baudhāyana, Gujarat (Ānarta), Sindh, Kathiawar, and the Dakhan were outside the desirable area; for there he held the inhabitants were of mongrel origin (saṃkīṛnayonayaḥ); He who went by foot to Kaliṅga gathered sin. But even excluded areas were open to transit for approach to sacred shrines, sites and waters (tīrtha). The entire area watered by the Ganges is holy. The condemnation of certain areas did not preclude the specification within them of places which were exceptions, on account of their holiness (tirtha-bhāva); for instance the Ādipurāṇa specifies Gayā, the hermitage of Cyavana and the forest round Rājagṛha as sacred. Localities or areas which have been commended by Purāṇas as holy (see Tīrthakāṇḍa, passim) are condemned by other Purāṇas. The performance of s'rāddha, pious acts and marriages in the excluded areas is interdicted for the twice-born. Manu's indication of Brahmāvarta and Brahmaṛṣides'a as areas in which the traditional conduct (ācāra) of Brāhmaṇas constituted the norm for others, probably reflects the conditions of his age; for, as pointed out by Medhātithi, in the very same areas, according to Baudhāyana, actions contrary to Dharma were customary, and accordingly all that the dvija of the area practises will not be a standard but that alone which is consistent with Dharma. This is arguing in a circle. He therefore rightly points out that the indications in Manu should be treated only as general commendation, i.e., not to be taken literally.

Additional criteria for an area fit for Aryan occupation are specified by the Ādipurāṇa, viz., it must have abundance of barley and kus'a grass, two common ingredients for yajñas. The impracticability of a rigorous application of the rules of exclusion laid down by themselves leads to the Purāṇic rule that a "distressed" householder may live in such areas (Skandapurāṇa, cited in Vīramitrodaya, p. 60).

That sanctity or the want of it cannot permanently attach to any area is seen by the inclusion of almost all the area of India in Tīrthakāṇḍa and by the exclusion of the "land of the Five Rivers," the Punjab, which was the holy land of the Ṛg-Veda, as unfit for Aryan occupation, in some authorities, and the commencement of Āryāvarta (according to others) from the eastern bank of the Indus river (Sindhu). The root ideas in the rules are the prevalence of the varṇa system, which is held to be of divine origin, and the presence of accessories for doing the daily rites of the twice-born. This is why the area is called yajñiyades'a. Yajña, according to a Vedic legend,[1] escaped from heaven and wandered over the earth in the form of a black antelope (kṛṣṇa-mṛga), and the white, black and yellow spots on its skin are held to represent the three Vedas. Its skin (kṛṣṇājina) is regarded as particularly holy. It is good to cover one's seat with it. The brahmacārin should wear a bit of it.

TECHNICAL TERMS IN DHARMAS'ĀSTRA (PARIBHĀṢĀ)

As collections of modern laws are preceded by a "general clauses act," so also digests provide a short statement of technical terms and details, which are presumed in daily rites. Lakṣmīdhara devotes his second parva in this kāṇḍa to it (pp. 50-72). Many of these topics are dealt with in the appendices (paris'iṣṭas) to gṛhyasūtras. Both Caṇḍes'vara (Kṛtya-ratnākara, pp. 44-82) and Mitramis'ra (Paribhāṣāprakās'a in Vīramitrodaya, pp. 70-116) virtually reproduce, with appreciative remarks and small changes Lakṣmīdhara's parva on paribhāṣa, which has remained the standard for later writers.

INGREDIENTS OF A RITE

An enjoined act will yield fruit only when it is performed with attention to details, which may be regarded therefore as its essential ingredients. The idea applies to all rites. First among them is the competence of the person who does the act (adhikāra); an act done by one who has no competence is fruitless. He must possess faith (sraddhā) in the obligatory character and fruitfulness of the rite (Devala). He should adhere in practice (ācāra) to what has been laid down by authorities like Manu. He must know the Veda (vedajña). He must be firmly convinced of the efficacy of the action in the life to come after death. The wealth used must have been justly earned (nyāyārjita); performing acts of charity with wealth that has been robbed is futile. Faith is more needed for the efficacy of an enjoined rite than the materials used in it or even its formulae. This is why the moral qualities are placed first in the enumeration.

[1] शतपथब्राह्मण, १, १, ४, १-२.

Partners in the fruit of a rite are three: he who initiates it (as by endowment) prayojitā, he who directs it (anumantā) and he who actually does it. Contrariwise, all share in the results of a failure of the rite. Repetition of a rite yields additional spiritual result. One who knows the rule, should aim at the best possible, and not the second best. (Manu, XI, 31). Rites are as good as not done (akriyā) if they are done according to the rules of a s'ākhā different from one's own, or in violation of the rules laid down in his own sūtra. Following the rules of another s'ākhā than one's own is forbidden exeept where on the topic concerned his own rites-book is silent. A rite in which a mistake occurs in the middle should be re-done, beginning where the error had occurred, if the error is discovered when the rite is in process of execution. If after the rite is finished, it is found that a part of it was wrongly done, then in redoing the rite, only that part which was done in error may be redone. If a main part of a rite is omitted, the whole must be done again but if the omitted ritual is trifling, there is no need for the repetition of the rite at all (p. 53), but an expiation (prāyas'citta) is necessary for the omission.

THE TĪRTHAS

Tīrtha is the technical name for the part of the right hand from which water is poured in religious rites, and specific names are given to each part, which help to indicate the purpose of the water-offering. Vis'varūpa (Yājñavalkya, I, 19) appears to think that the nomenclature of the tīrthas is merely complimentary. Five of them are specified: Brāhma or Kāya, Prājāpatya, Daiva, Ārṣa or Mānuṣa, Pitṛya and Āgneya or Pārameṣṭhya or Saumya. In regard to the location of three of these there is agreement among the authorities—Pitṛya, Āgneya and Daiva; but in regard to the other two there is difference of view. The interval between the right thumb and forefinger roots is Pitṛya; the middle of the palm is āgneya: and the tips of the fingers are Daiva. Vasiṣṭha distinguishes between the mānuṣa and ārsa, the tip of the forefinger being ārsa and the tips of fingers generally being mānuṣa. (Lakṣmīdhara omits all the sūtras of Vaṣiṣtha, except the definition of mānuṣa; p. 53); others identify them, as the tip of the forefinger which is defined as ārṣa being also daiva or mānuṣa-Brāhma is the line to the left of the right thumb, according to Hārīta (p. 53), the roots of the fingers, according to Baudhyāyana, the line to the left of the root of the thumb, going towards the front, according to Saṅkha-Likhitau, and the centre of the right palm, according to Brahmapurāṇa (quoted by Mitramis'ra, op. cit., p. 76) Prājāpatyatīrtha is the line behind (pas'cāt) the little finger, the root of the little finger according to S'aṅkha, and the space between the little finger and the palm, according to S'aṅkha-Likhitau. In view of the meticulous care to be exercised in the performance of enjoined rites the different significances of the two tīrthas, which Lakṣmīdhara does not explain or reconcile (nor Mitramis'ra) is curious; especially as the sūtras which contain the definitions are common to every one, irrespective of their s'ākha (Vedic school).

According to Manu the sipping of water, which should precede all rites (see p. 62 below) should be done out of Brāhma, Prājāpatya or Daiva tīrthas, and never out of the Pitṛya-tirtha (II, 58). Touching the water (upaspars'ana) is by Brāhma, and sipping water, tending the fire (homa) and tarpaṇa (except to the manes, obviously) by the Prājāpatya; sprinkling water, (mārjana), offering worship (arcana) and eating by Daiva, making offerings to the manes by Pitṛya, and receiving gifts by Āgneya (p. 54). Āgneya (somatīrtha) is also prescribed for touching the water vessel (kamaṇḍalu) and taking curds (dadhiprās'ana). Unlike the ordinary s'rāddha, in the nāndī-s'rāddha, which has to be done prior to any auspicious ceremony such as marriage, the offering of piṇḍa and water should be by the Prājāpatya, i.e. not by the Pitṛya. The offering of fried rice (lāja) etc. in homas should be by the palm (Āgneya) and all ācamana by Prājāpatya (p. 55). Fees (dakṣiṇā)—like gifts—should be received on the palm.

PRELIMINARIES TO RITES

The performer (adhikārin) of rites to propitiate gods and manes becomes fit for them only after bath, as also for entering on prayers of a holy nature (pavitrajapa) and making enjoined gifts (dāna). He should wear washed clothes, and be fully clad (alaṅkṛta) i.e., wear garlands. In s'rāddhas and similar rites, he should observe silence and continence. No rites for gods or manes should be done by one clad in ochre-colored clothing. (p. 57); nor should prayers (japa) be undertaken with wet clothes on. The kakṣa (the knot of the cloth going between the legs) must not be loose in any rites; nor should they be done wearing only a single cloth, i.e. without uttarīya (upper garment). He who wears his second garment, tied round his waist, will be, like one with a single garment, disqualified for a religious rite. All acts, except sipping water, have to be done sitting on a seat; but one should not sit on a seat with his feet, knees or legs fully over it (praudhapāda). That is to say, he should sit in such a way that his feet are on the ground and his legs and knees are lifted above the seat. Every ceremony should begin with a prasavā or permission accorded by Brāhmaṇas present, in the form of a benediction (puṇyāham bhavantu iti) (p. 55). All mantras should begin with the utterance of praṇava ("Om"). In regard to time for performance of proper acts, baths, gifts etc. they should not be done before sunrise (p. 58). (Bathing at night during a lunar eclipse is an exception, as well as performing at night a tarpaṇa for the manes on the occasion). Rites for gods should be done before midday, rites for the manes in the afternoon. When not otherwise specified for a rite, the right hand should alone be used in it. When not otherwise specified as to how one should sit (e.g. facing south in a s'rāddha or pitṛ-tarpaṇa) the east, the north, and north-east should be faced by the performer. Rites should not be done standing or stooping (prahva) but seated. In reciting Vedic mantras, the name of the ṛṣi responsible for its application (viniyoga) the metre, and the god intended must be named; omission to do so will weaken the rite (p. 59). Knowledge of these particulars about every mantra used, as well as its meaning and significance deserves honor (p. 59). For every mantra uttered, five things should be known: context, application, fruit, deity praised, and basis (p. 61). The performer should wear his sacred thread hanging from his left shoulder (upavīti). His top-knot should be tied up. (It is otherwise in funerals) when performing rites, meeting elders, teachers, guests, studying the Veda, and eating (p. 61). The sacred thread should be upavīta for ordinary rites, prācīnāvīta (hang in the reverse direction from the right shoulder to the left hip) in s'rāddha and funerals, tied round the waist in incantations (ābhicāra), and hang round the neck for vulgar actions. One should hold his right arm out of the upper garment when he is in the presence of the sacred fire, in cow-pens, in sacrifices, in making gifts, and in sipping water (ācamana) (p. 62). He should sip water (apaḥa s'pṛs'et) when he has recited mantras for manes, when touching himself in a rite in an enjoined manner (ātmālambe), when he speaks harshly or falsely when he has been touched by cats or mice and when his anger has been roused. When any small lapse has occurred in a rite he should repeat the mantra of name of Viṣṇu (p. 63). Food should not be eaten, gifts accepted or made, oblations offered and sacrifices done by the arm which is not held between the knees (p. 64). One should be silent at twilight, prayer, meals, cleaning teeth, rites in honor of the manes or gods, in easing oneself, in the presence of elders, in making or receiving gifts, and in practising yoga (p. 64).

All religious and auspicious rites have to be done with kus'a grass (darbha) and ringlets made of them (pavitra) have to be worn. Elaborate rules have been laid down in regard to the kind of kus'a to be used, its length, color etc., the time when they can be gathered, and the places from which it should not be collected (p. 66). The darbha grass is always pure and holy and can be used over and over again, like the skin of the antelope (kṛṣṇājina) and the sacred fire. They do not become contaminated if it is kept with the sacred thread or in the waist knot (paridhānavastra-granthi). In japa (prayer), homa, gifts, Vedic study and in, rites to manes, the hand should not be empty of a pavitra, or kus'a, or gold or silver. The sandhyā prayer done without darbha, a gift made without pouring water (as a sign of release of proprietorship) and prayers that are not counted are all fruitless (p. 67).

The sacred fire has to be kept alive by offerings of bits of wood named samit. Any kind of wood or fuel cannot be used. Certain types of cut samit alone can be used for certain rites. These are specified on pp. 67-68. Barley or wheat has to be used when an offering of grain has to be made, and in their place, rice. Where the ritual does not specify the offering, clarified butter (ājya) should be used, and where the deity is unspecified, Prajāpati must be inferred (p. 69). Where a prescribed thing is unavailable for a rite, one that resembles it closely may be used e.g., among flowers, roots, leaves, stalks, shoots, fruits, essences and scents; and if such are unavailable, barley can be substituted for every one of them (p. 69). A religious rite is complete only when a fee has been paid (dakṣinā) ; and if it is unavailable in coin, fruits or roots can be offered instead. Various substitutes for unavailable objects are named e.g., clarified butter or curds for ājya. Threshing, pounding and drawing lines in front of the performer in prescribed rites should be single for auspicious rites and triple for those relating to the manes (p. 70). Offerings for the manes should be placed on the ground or on kus'a spread over a winnower (s'ūrpa).

The feeding of Brāhmaṇas is prescribed for all important rites. For the nuptial ceremony (garbhādhāna) the number to be fed is ten ; similarly for other domestic rites ; in the installation of the household fire, twenty-three ; over a hundred for the āgrāyaṇa and expiatory ceremonies ; one hundred in an animal sacrifice, five hundred in Sautrāmaṇi, ten-thousand in the Vājapeya sacrifice, and forty thousand in an As'vamedha- (horse sacrifice). The prescription is cited from the lost gṛhya of Yajñapārs'va. It will explain how poor Brāhmaṇas were unable to do even such sacrifices as the āgrāyaṇi (p. 71).

The section ends with a specification of the size of offerings made in the fire (āhuti) (pp. 71-72) and the maintenance of a fire from dying out. Offerings have to be made in a fire that has not died out. To kindle the flame the fire should not be stirred by a fan or a winnower, but it should be done by blowing on it with the mouth. The rule prohibiting a fire being blown upon by the mouth is stated as intended for only the ordinary kitchen fire.

THE SAṀSKĀRAS

Saṁskāra means "preparation," i.e., by making things orderly or good. In the Brāhmaṇa a well-cleaned house is referred to as "ṣamskṛta."[1] The act of purification as a preliminary is meant by the word in Mīmāṁsa works; and as such purification is preparatory to the beginning of a rite, all else that is preparatory, like tonsure is included under it.[2] Defined by its result, saṁskāra is used to denote a rite that imparts fitness. Lakṣmīdhara does not define the word. Mitramis'ra defines it as "the high quality in the body or the spirit (ātmani), which is specially produced by the performance of an enjoined rite."[3] He states that it is of two kinds: one confers fitness to do other rites or actions (karmāntara), like upanayana, which makes a person fit to undertake the study of the Veda; the other merely removes an evil taint or influence, (ill-luck) which may exist in the person subjected to it, like the taint flowing from seed and womb, which is removed by rites like jātakarma. The effect is mystic, and attaches itself to the saṁskāra. It is a preparation of both body and mind, a step in the development of personality. Without undergoing saṁskāras, one to whom they are made obligatory loses the opportunity of attaining the puruṣārthas, or aims of existence ending with mokṣa. As the purpose of Dharmas'āstra is to show the way to the ultimate attainment of the last puruṣārtha, and human incarnation itself is an opportunity vouchsafed to redeem oneself by his own actions, the performance of various saṁskāras is indicated by smṛtis as obligatory. The statement that after upanayana, vivāha (marriage) and further saṁskāras are not compulsory misses the obligation to live a full ritualistic life in order to attain the summum bonum. As in the Hindu theory, the varṇas represent gradations of advance in spiritual attainment, in virtue of past action (karma), owing to which the dvija (twice-born) is initially a step nearer the goal than the non-dvija, the performance of these rites of purification must be for all, but with such changes as are required to conform to other rules. Thus, it is laid down (p. 96) that all saṁskāras upto upanayana must be done for girls as for boys, but without using Vedic mantras, at the proper time and in the proper way (yathākālam, yathākramam), marriage being the only vaidika equivalent to girls for the upanayana and its incidents like living with the guru (gurau vāsa) and worshipping the sacred fire (agniprakriyā). Stripped of imagery, it is a denial of upanayana to girls, and the assumption that when the saṁskāra of vivāha is done for them, it includes the upanayana. As women are denied the right to pronounce Vedic mantras, the homas which are prescribed for some of the saṁskāras (other than vivāha), should be done for them by others, who pronounce the mantras. The performance of saṁskāras by the boys and girls of a family is an obligation that lies upon its members, and in partition, provision should be made for their due performance in the case of both. The obligation is expressly made to include marriage.[1] S'ūdras are prohibited from using Vedic mantras, but in their case also the performance of saṁskāras is indicated but without their uttering mantras. This may mean that the ritual is done silently (tūṣṇīm), and without homa (fire-worship) or done, as in the case of women, by a Brāhmaṇa "deputy." This is allowed in general terms by Manu (X, 127),[2] whose declaration that the S'ūdra deserves no saṁskāra (IV, 80)[3] should be taken to mean saṁskāras with Vedic mantras. (Kane, II, p. 159). That Manu was not for the exclusion of the S'ūdra from saṁskāras may be inferred by his allowing that of nāmakaraṇam to the S'ūdra (II, 33, p. 91 infra). Lakṣmīdhara has cited Yama to show that all saṁskāras from niṣeka (garbhādhāna) to antyeṣṭi should be done for the S'ūdra as for the dvija without repeating mantras, because when the Creator created the varṇas he was not created by the Veda, (p. 73). Lakṣmīdhara notes that the dictum of Yama is in the context of saṁskāras preceding upanayana, which is obviously beyond the S'ūdra's obligation, like the vratas of the initiated (upanīta) and the sacrifices that the dvija performs after becoming a householder (gṛhastha). Vaijavāpa-gṛhyasūtra, which Lakṣmīdhara cites often, expressly indicates as obligatory to the S'ūdra but without mantras the following saṁskāras: garbhādhāna, puṁsavana, sīmantonnayana, jātakarma, nāmakaraṇa, annaprās'ana and caula.[1]

The obligation to perform saṁskāras is indicated by the prescription of penances for their omission.

Lakṣmīdhara cites a verse of Brahmapurāṇa (p. 74) which declares that the S'ūdra obtains the vivāhasaṁskāra alone (mātra), and interprets the word "alone" as signifying that he is released from the duty to do the others, such as rites in honor of the gods which cannot be done without mantras. His citation of authority for the prescription for women, of the performance of all saṁskāras (except vivāha) without mantras, immediately below the above enunciation, may suggest that he was against S'ūdras doing the other saṁskāras. Aparārka holds that the word mātra may be construed as either obligation to do them without mantras or release from the obligation to do any of the saṁskāras prior to marriage (p. 74).

Hārīta, describes the effects of performing the saṁskāras: by garbhādhāna, the child in the womb obtains fitness for learning the Veda: by puṁsavana its male sex accrues; by sīmanta it loses the taint from parents, for, in five ways may taint arise in parents, which are overcome successively by the rites of jātakarma, nāmakaraṇa, prās'ana, caula, and samāvartana; by the performance of the eight saṁskāras (vratas) following upanayana the child becomes fit in due course for doing rites for the manes and Gods. The obligation to perform the prescribed saṁskāras lies equally on all dvijas (p. 76). Their number, according to Gautama (p. 76) is forty ; he omits antyeṣṭi for the dead person. Hārīta divides saṁskāras into two classes : brāhma consisting of all upto snānam (prior to marriage) ; and daiva which consists of the seven minor sacrifices (pākayajñas), the seven havir-yajñas and the seven soma sacrifices ; by doing the first one obtains equality with the sages and association with them in their world, while by the second, one obtains the same with the gods (p. 77). In short by the performance of the rites, the human frame and soul become fit for union with Brahman. (Manu, p. 77). The list of Gautama (upto upanayana) omits certain saṁskāras, which Lakṣmīdhara describes. These are (1) the preparation of the confinement chamber (sūtikāgṛhasaṁskāra), (2) the rite for expediting safe delivery (soṣyantīkarma) and (3) anavalobhanam (garbharakṣā), protection of the foetus. An omission in both is niṣkramaṇa (taking out the child from the house for the first time), which is also called ādityadars'ana, but it is a minor rite.

The first union of husband and wife (niṣeka, garbhādhāna) is treated as a sacred rite, commensurate to the responsibility of procreating a fit son, and it is approached with due solemnity and in a religious spirit. Mantras have to be recited before the union actually takes place, but there is no homa on the day. The union is to take place at the ṛtu (from the fourth to the sixteenth night following the cessation of the menstrual flow) which is regarded as conducive to pregnancy. According to some authorities the mantras have to be recited at every union till conception becomes evident. After pregnancy is manifest, pre-natal rites are enjoined for making the embryo a male (puṁsavanam). This must be done fairly early in the period of gestation, before the sex is determined. Sīmantonnayana may take place any time from the fourth month and before confinement (yāvad na prasavaḥ, p. 83). It is to be done only for the first conception. Puṁsavana should, according to authorities (e.g., Aparārka, p. 79) be repeated at every pregnancy, along with garbharakṣā, while others (e.g., the Mitākṣarā) accept Devala's view that one performance is enough, on the ground that it is for the purification of the mother and not the foetus (garbha). The importance attached to the birth of a son, in saving ancestors from perdition, makes the ceremony of jātakarman, following birth of a son, specially solemn. The gods and the manes are said to flock to the house where a son is born; in their honor gifts should be made and Brahmaṇas should be fed. The rite of utthānam (" rising from the confinement bed ") commonly known as puṇyāhavācanam from the benedictions uttered on the cessation of the ten days of birth-impurity is not specially mentioned. The father (or in his absence an agnate) should whisper in the right ear of the newly born male child the words " speech, speech " and the secret name of the child (p. 88). This is known as medhā-jananam (creation of intelligence). The naming ceremony may take place between the tenth and eighteenth days after birth (p. 88), though Gobhila will allow it to be done within a year (p. 89). Rules for the names to be given to the child, according to sex, and caste are briefly indicated. They should reflect their varṇa, future duties and the luck desired for them. The first feeding of the child with cooked food (annam) may be done after it is six months old and before it is a year old (p. 93). Caula or tonsure should be done for children of the twice-born caste, after the first feeding, or upto the third year, according to the family custom (p. 95). Lakṣmīdhara's account of caula seems to confine it to male children, but Manu's dictum that all saṁskāras (as'eṣataḥ) should be done for girls as for boys, but without repeating mantras, except in vivāha, would imply that caula should be done for girls also. Mitramis'ra (p. 317) (apparently reflecting usage) says that the tonsure of a girl should follow family custom (yathā kuladharmam), and either it may not be done at all, or be a full tonsure (sarvamuṇḍanam) or leave a tuft of hair (sikhā) on the head.

POSITION OF THE UNINITIATED BOY (ANUPANĪTADHARMA)

Infancy extends upto the first feeding with cooked food, according to S'ātātapa, childhood upto tonsure, and boyhood upto initiation (mauñjībandhana). To remove impurity following from the touch of a menstruous woman, sprinkling with water is enough for an infant, and sipping it for a child; and in the case of boys (uninitiated) a full bath is needed to remove the impurity. Āpastamba refers to the view that infants are not impure before their annaprās'ana, or their first year, or till they can know the cardinal points, but holds that there can be no impurity till initiation (p. 99). Before it, a boy can eat the leavings of the food of his parents, eat interdicted articles (like garlic or stale food) and eat as often as he likes, need not observe rules about voiding urine etc. and needs nothing but mere washing to cleanse himself. He should not be allowed to perform oblations in the fire, or make Bali offerings, nor when he has to do a s'rāddha recite any mantras but only say "svadhā." If he is a Brāhmaṇa boy, he should not drink wine. He will be like a S'ūdra, but his touch will not convey pollution (as'uddhi) to a dvija. After upanayana, he becomes liable to the disciplined life in which the relaxations will disappear.

UPANAYANA (PARVA II, PP. 100-124)

The saṁskāra of upanayana is the most important of all. What garbhādhāna is to the creation of man, that upanayana is to that of his personality. It is in this sense that it is deemed a second birth. Manu (II, 169 inf. p. 100) speaks of three births, the first from his mother, the second when his girdle is tied on (i.e., when his upanayana takes place) and the third when he is initiated in a Vedic sacrifice. As the qualification for the last arises from his initiation into the Veda, the third birth has been rightly construed as complimentary, to stress the importance of the second. This is why the three first varṇas are termed dvija, twice-born, while the S'ūdra is ekajāti, i.e., once born. All saṁskāras preceding it only lead to it. One cannot be initiated unless his prior saṁskāras have been performed, and if any of them has been omitted, it has to be re-done before the upanayana, and the prāyas'citta (rite of expiation) prescribed for the omission must be first done. In the same way, as marriage is said to be the upanayana for girls, any similar omissions of saṁskāras in their case must be made good before they can enter into wedlock. One born to Brāhmaṇa parents is called a Brāhmaṇa (though for ritualistic purposes he will be treated as the equal of a S′ūdra), till his initiation, when he becomes a dvija (twice-born) ; he is called a vipra, when he has studied the Veda ; and he is called a s′rotriya in virtue of all the three (Atri. 141-142). Upanayana is the prelude to Vedic study (adhyayana), and that is why one of the rites in the ceremony of initiation is medhājanana, i.e., creation of spiritual intelligence. It corresponds to medhājanana in the rite of jātakarman (p. 75). The formal initiation of a child in letters is not treated as a saṁskāra in smṛtis, but vidyāraṁbha has always been an important domestic event, and is done before upanayana and after caula. But brahmavidyāraṁbha, i.e., initiation into the Veda is only possible after upanayana. After it both Vedic and secular education go together during the period of studentship (brahmacarya), though the smṛtis refer only to the former, as their attention is concentrated on the rites for the Brāhmaṇa mainly. It is by such study, which cannot be accomplished without upanayana, that the second of the three debts (ṛṇatraya) viz., the debt to the sages (ṛṣiṛṇa) can be discharged. Upanayana marks entry into the first of the four stages (ās′ramas) of life to a dvija, and the first ās′rama is the portal to both family life (gārhasthya) and to that of an ascetic (sanyāsin), which constitute the second and fourth ās′ramas. A dvija cannot be married till his upanayana has been done, and he has been formally admitted to the first ās′rama. It is its vital and basic nature that makes brahmacarya so important, and its regulation by minute rules, a matter of vital social discipline. The division of society into varṇas and of a man's life into stages or ās′ramas is equally aimed at the spiritual advance of man, and the attainment of the ultimate end of emancipation. Both parts of the plan go back to the earliest history of Aryan India. In Vedic literature there is evidence of the features of brahmacarya and of the rites of the upanayana-saṁskāra. Upanayana is provided for in Avestan literature.

QUALIFICATION FOR UPANAYANA

Only a 'dvija' by birth can be initiated: i.e., he must be the son of parents, who are both of the regenerate castes. All saṁskāras upto caula must have been done prior to upanayana. He must possess sufficient intelligence to be able to understand his duties and submit to the discipline of brahmacarya. This is why the ages normal for entry to upanayana are fixed for the three castes respectively as the eighth year from conception, the eleventh and the twelfth. (If reckoned from birth, the figures would be each less by one, as in Laugākṣi's reckoning, p. 101). It is open to initiate a boy of the three castes at the ages of five, six, and eight (Manu, II, 37, p. 102) but it is exceptional, and is allowed to those who wish to gain special powers for the initiate. The contradictions that seem to exist in the indications of ages mentioned by different smṛtis (pp. 101-102) are thus resolved by Lakṣmīdhara: the general opinion of smṛtis is that the normal ages are the eighth, eleventh and twelfth, reckoning from conception, for boys of the three varṇas. The upper limits of age within which the initiation may be done without expiatory rites are the twelfth, sixteenth and twentieth years, and with such expiation the sixteenth, twenty-second and twenty-fourth years; and after these limits the uninitiated are reckoned as having "fallen" (in caste) by omission to get initiated into Sāvitrī-mantra and to have become vrātyas, whose rehabilitation, before being initiated, will have to be done by the vrātya-stoma rite described in the Tāṇḍya Brāhmaṇa (XVIII, 4). It is not permissible to intermarry with vrātyas (p. 104).

Among disqualifications are drinking wine and unchastity, which can be rectified by prāyaścitta (proper expiatory rites) and blindness, insanity and dumbness (p. 103). The indication of unchastity in the candidate for initiation appears to contemplate the adolescent or grown up candidate, whose initiation has been deferred beyond the normal age. S'ūdras cannot be initiated. The interdiction of upanayana to those whose credentials have not been examined (a-parīkṣita) must refer to the examination of grounds for disqualification. The story of Jābala Satyakāma in the Chāndogya Upaniṣad (IV, 4, 1-5), who was questioned about his gotra before initiation, is an illustration. Those whose actions have condemned them (duṣṭakarma) are not eligible till they have expiated the lapses (p. 105). In the case of even very young people the exemption from ordinary impurity is expressly excluded from the commission of grievous sins like drinking liquor (madyapāna, p. 105).

INITIATION

The initiation is to be done by a guru, who, after it is done, should first teach the boy the rules of ritual, purity (s'auca), proper conduct (ācāra), the method of tending the sacred fire (agnikārya) and the performance of the twilight prayers (sandhyopāsanā), according to Manu (II, 69). A second dictum of Manu (II, 140) defines the ācārya as the twice-born person, who having performed the initiation (upanīya) of the pupil instructs him further in the Veda along with the works on Vedic ritual (kalpa) and the Upaniṣad (rahasya), (inf. p. 206). Yājñavalkya (I, 34) distinguishes the guru and the ācārya: the former is he who having performed the saṁskāras ending with the upanayana (kriyāḥ kṛtvā) gives the pupil the Veda i.e., the Sāvitrī, while the latter is he who does only the upanayana and teaches the Veda. If a father does both, as in Vaidika families will be normal, he is both guru and ācārya. This is also the view of Manu (II, 141-142, p. 206). Two verses of Yama are cited by Lakṣmīdhara in two different places (p. 105, in introducing the topic of upanayana, and p. 207, in dealing with those who are entitled to homage from the brahmacārin), which specify the moral qualities, and Vedic knowledge that an ācārya should possess. The context in which the citation is first made seems to suggest that it is only the possession of such qualities and knowledge which will entitle a father to act as guru in the upanayana ceremony. Vis'varūpa (Yājña., I, 15) states that the word guru in the verse definitely means the father, who must officiate in the upanayana. He cites a Vedic authority for making the father do the initiation.[1] But even in the earliest times the initiated boy was often sent to the house of another guru, who accepted him and looked after his further training.[1] The rules for getting food by begging show that the brahmacārin could not have lived with his own family in ancient times. In modern times few fathers have the Vedic qualifications for officiating in the ceremony of initiation, but the custom of having it done by the father continues. There would be no need to describe the end of the period of brahmacarya as a 'return' (samāvartana) if the brahmacārin had lived all the time in the parental home, nor will there be need to emphasize the married girl's finding in her 'service to her husband' the substitute for living with the guru, and in her 'household work' that for tending the sacred fire (Manu, II, 68, inf. p. 96), when she is treated as having had upanayana.

The candidate for initiation should, after tonsure and bath, be decked with ornaments (Pāraskara, II, 2, 6), be clad in unwashed and new clothes, be provided with a yajñopavīta (sacred thread), a girdle (mekhalā, mauñji) and a staff (daṇḍa). He should then approach the initiating guru, who, after a homa, in the course of which a samit (piece of fuel-stick) is placed silently in the fire by the boy, takes hold of him by the thumb, after investing him with the sacred thread and tying the girdle round his waist. The guru sits close to and face to face with the boy, so that they see each other, and slowly repeats the Sāvitrī verse, pāda by pāda, and makes the boy recite it, and at the end they recite the whole verse together. This is the rule in regard to the initiation of a Brāhmaṇa boy. From that moment the initiated should not omit recitation of the Sāvitrī at the appointed daily prayers (p. 115). Then having taken the staff (daṇḍa), worshipped the Sun (with the mādhyāhnika prayer), and made a circuit (pradakṣiṇa) of the fire, the brahmacārin starts on his alms-collection (bhaikṣacaryā).

It may be noted that, before his tonsure, as the first preparatory rite for the initiation, the boy is made to take some food along with some boys of his own age. This is known as kumārabhojana. This, along with his decoration in ornaments, is indicative of the petting which a child receives in the family circle and which will cease after the upanayana. After he has been inducted in Sāvitrī, invested with the sacred thread (yajñopavīta) and the mekhalā (girdle), and given the staff, (daṇḍa) the boy is a complete brahmacārin, entering upon the ascetic discipline of a life dedicated to Vedic study. Hereafter, there is meaning in the statement that his mother is not his natural mother but Sāvitrī. After the brahmopades'am, the new clothes he has worn and his ornaments are taken away, to show the change that has taken place in his life. It may be noted that the first and last ās'rama, i.e., of the brahmacārin and that of the sanyāsin are both mendicant ās'ramas. Members of neither have the right to cook their own food, but must get it as alms (bhikṣā) from others. It is part of the discipline that even the quantity of the food they can consume is specified, eight mouthfuls being the limit for the sanyāsin (aṣṭau grāsāḥ muner bhoktum) and an unlimited quantity for the brahmacārin (amitam brahmacāriṇaḥ, Mokṣakaṇḍa, p. 59). In dealing with the rules about eating, Lakṣmīdhara cites (p. 124) a smṛti verse which states that for keeping up their strength an unlimited amount of food should be allowed to the fire, the draught-ox and the brahmacārin. The student must hereafter depend upon society for his subsistence.

[1] The Upaniṣads give instances of learned fathers who placed their sons under other teachers.

The ascetic (sanyāsin) is completely cut away from society, except for the food he may get by begging. The brahmacārin, on the other hand, is only cut away from his family. He becomes a member of his guru's family, and the relations of the natural family are held to be repeated in the guru's family circle for him. He may inherit, like a son, from his guru : his co-students, like brothers may be his heirs. He is not, like the ascetic forced into a life of wandering, but remains with his teacher for years. His Vedic study is uninterrupted by domestic events, like birth and death, but his social relationship which continues, is indicated by the cessation of his study in the interval between the death of a king and the accession of his successor. The rule that he should get his first alms from his own mother, mother's sister and sister, whom he addresses as 'Lady' (bhavatī) when soliciting alms, precisely in the same form of the words as he uses to strangers, emphasizes his separation from the family circle. The further rules that, in selecting houses from which he might collect alms, he should prefer those of strangers, and only on failure to get food from them he should approach those of his cognates, agnates and teacher (p. 127) stress this feature. The common idea that the brahmacārin is fed by the teacher is incorrect; the boy must bring all the collected food to his teacher, and even coin or precious things, thrown into his begging bowl (which should not be of brass) and with his permission eat the food alone and in silence. If the teacher is absent, permission must be obtained from the guru's wife, son, etc. (p. 119). Food obtained by begging is regarded as purer than that given out of affection (p. 119). The food is begged not for himself, but for the ācārya. He should eat what he gets gladly, (p. 123), i.e. show no repulsion or disgust. As the rule is the same for the brahmacārin born of a rich or a poor family, it generates a feeling of brotherhood and equality. Flesh food should be avoided in begging (p. 118). Honey accidentally given as alms and consumed does not contaminate the student, who has to avoid all luxuries.

Lakṣmīdhara gives what he considers authoritative dicta on the nature of the clothing to be worn by the student, of each varṇa, the composition and length of the sacred thread and girdle for each varṇa, the trees from which the staff can be cut, the length of the staff, and the qualities it should possess. Like the ascetic, the student must always carry his staff. According to Aparārka (p. 57) the uses of the daṇḍa are support, protection against cattle and guidance (by plumbing) when crossing a stream.[1] But the staff was more symbolic than utilitarian, standing for the brahmacārin's submission to the spirit of Punishment, (Daṇḍa), which upholds the entire world. The kinds of wood used will not make the staff useful for the purposes mentioned by Aparārka.

RULES OF PURITY (S'AUCAM)

Ritualistic purity is necessary for the solemn performance of the daily prayers and the maintenance of the sacred fire. Ordinary corporeal purity is necessary for ritualistic, but the sipping of water (ācamana), repeating certain mantras while doing so, and sprinkling (mārjana) are even more important. When physical cleanliness is ensured, it is made perfect only after ācamana, which marks the final stage of purification of body and mind, by the association of sipping and spraying with mantra and touching various parts of the body. For each of the acts mystic effect is indicated.

---

[1] तत्र दण्डस्य कार्यमवलम्बनं गवादिनिवारणं तमोवगाहनमप्सुप्रवेशनमित्यादि । (अपरार्क, ५७)

ĀCAMANA (SIPPING WATER)

Ācamana is done thrice, each time reciting a holy name, and a mantra, beginning with the praṇava or Oṁkāra, for which the utmost holiness and efficacy are attributed. The mystic virtues of Oṁkāra are elaborated by Lakṣmīdhara in Mokṣakāṇḍa (p. 196 ff.). In Brahmacārikāṇḍa he deals similarly with ācamana. It should be done in clean water, and not water taken from rain-spout, puddles or from contaminated sources or from foam (pp. 132-133). It is associated with the performance of prāṇāyāma, whose mystic qualities are dealt with in Mokṣakāṇḍa. The ācamana is prescribed, after the washing of the face and feet, as necessary for the removal of every kind of impurity, pollution, mental no less than physical. For example, it should be done if one had conversed with S'ūdras or with outcastes (patitāh), (p. 139) or spoken harshly or angrily (paruṣabhāṣaṇa), or falsely (anṛtābhāṣaṇa). As such incidents might occur in places in which water is not immediately available for ācamana, touching the right ear is indicated as a substitute (s'rotrācamana).

The sipping has to be done, squatting, with the hands held between the knees, and not crouching, or standing, or standing on a terrace, or lying down, or walking, or standing in water, or talking in the middle, or looking down upon one's own body, or with loose clothes and loose hairtuft (muktakes'a) or touching with the hand the body below the navel. It should be done by taking the water in the cupped right-hand shaped like the ear of a cow (gokarṇa). One should face the east or the north, when making ācamana (p. 130). One should not wear shoes or sandals when making ācamana nor do it in a fit of absentee of mind (acittaḥ, p. 131). When one has woke up from sleep, or risen from eating, cleared his throat, drunk any fluid, taken an oil-bath or any bath, washed the feet, excreted, urinated, had emission of semen, etc., he should do one more ācamana. He should do an ācamana when he has come out from the street or touched any unclean thing. Ācamana should not be done when one is nude, or even when his waist-knot is loose (muktakaccha). It is required when one has undergone impurity, but certain things are declared as not impure (pp. 140-145) and as exceptions to the obligation to sip water as purification. The spirit of accommodation to difficulties is illustrated by Bṛhaspati's rule that one is not contaminated by failure to make immediate ācamana when he has excreted or become impure at night, or in a forest or a waterless tract, or in a place infested by robbers and wild animals with valuables in hand. In all cases, after physical ablution, ācamana completes the purification (p. 145).

CLEANLINESS (S'AUCAM)

A whole parva (VI) is devoted to this topic. Most of the regulations reproduced in this section are sanitary and the reasons for them are obvious. Not only is one asked to clean himself but also dispose of excreta in a proper way. In the rules to face certain cardinal points when urinating or voiding night or day, some mysticism is apparent. The prohibition to pollute river banks or beds, or water, (running or standing) or cremation grounds or holy places, roads, sacrificial grounds, and sown fields, (upta), or to make water from terraces (sopānāt) are all reasonable. The means of physical purification suggested are such as can be easily obtained, e.g., water, earth. Here also the spirit of accommodation is seen in the prescription of only half the purification needed by day for night pollution, and a fourth for those who are diseased or infirm or distressed (ātura), p. 160.

THE TWILIGHT PRAYERS (SANDHYĀ UPĀSANA)
(PARVA 7, PP. 162-182)

When the teacher has initiated the pupil, he should, according to Manu (II, 69) instruct him properly in the rules first of purity (s'aucam), proper demeanour (ācāra), the tending of the fire (agnikārya) and the twilight devotions (sandhyopāsana). Lakṣmīdhara, who invariably follows the order of enumeration in Manusmṛti, takes them however in this order: s'aucam, including ācamana, Sandhyā, agnikārya and ācāra, as logically the personal purification and mental clarity are to precede the approach to the sacred fire and are the first things in personal conduct.

Sandhyā means literally the point of junction, i.e., between night and day, i.e., twilight. The two daily prayers should be made at sandhyā, and they are named sandhyopāsana, and even sandhyā itself, by recognized usage, as pointed out by Medhātithi (II, 101).[1] Sandhyā is the time when it is neither fully light nor fully dark (na sarvam tamaḥ kṣīṇaṁ, nāpi paripūrṇaṁ prakās'a eṣa sandhyā—Medhātithi). The proper time for performing the morning and evening devotions is stated to be when the stars are still visible in the morning and a few stars are becoming visible in the evening. The morning sandhyā must be begun before sunrise, and finished when the solar disc becomes visible above the horizon; the evening sandhyā should be concluded when the stars appear. The normal time indicated for doing each is two nāḍikas (48 minutes or a muhūrta) : it should be begun in the morning before the sun appears and in the evening before it sets. But one may take longer time, if he does not contravene the rule against bathing by night for the first sandhyā.

The gṛhyasūtras indicate only the two twilight sandhyās, but a third prayer at noon, when the afternoon meets the forenoon, is also prescribed. According to Yogi-Yājñavalkya (p. 171) the presiding deities of the three are Gāyatrī for the morning, Sāvitrī for the midday, and Sarasvatī for the evening. Savitrī is white in complexion, Gāyatrī is ruddy, and Sarasvatī is dark. He who does the sandhyā worships Viṣṇu i.e., God (p. 172). On the day of the upanayana, there is no time for the morning devotion, for the mid-day sandhyā the worship of the Sun is done, and the life of the Brahmacārin starts with the evening sandhyā and worship of the Fire.

[1] उभयधर्मानिवृत्तौ च सन्ध्या—रात्रिधर्मेऽहर्धर्मे च । (मेधातिथिः, I, पृ. १२७)

The three sandhyās should be done by a dvija (p. 172). The sanyāsin and the vānaprastha as well as the naiṣṭhika should take a bath before doing each sandhyā, and the others should bathe only before beginning the morning and evening devotions. If one is unable through illness or 'bad time' to bathe, he may purify himself by sprinkling (mārjana) along with appropriate mantras (p. 172).

The first sandhyā should be done standing (as also the mid-day prayer) and the evening sandhyā should be done sitting. (This will not apply to the japa, which is done sitting, after repeating an āsanamantra). The best places for doing the sandhyās are outside one's residence: performing them in cow-pens (goṣṭha), rivers and temples will progressively add to the merit accruing (p. 164).

The proper purpose of the sandhyā is to cleanse oneself of sins (pāpa) committed in the intervals between two sandhyās. This can apply only to minor sins, born of the mind, speech, hands, feet, belly and the generative organs according to the formula of the prayer daily uttered. As illustrations of the sins that are overcome the following are mentioned: telling falsehoods (anṛtam), smelling spirits (madyagandha), sex-intercourse by day (divā-maithunam) and eating the food of an unrighteous person (adhārmikaḥ, vṛṣalaḥ, p. 163). Drinking wine will count as a major sin, which cannot be overcome by the daily prayer alone. Such sins should also have been committed inadvertently; deliberate intention will intensify the sin (p. 163).

The steps in the sandhyā are primarily these: bath, ācamana, after washing the feet and rinsing the mouth, mārjana (sprinkling with water along with appropriate purificatory mantras, pp. 167-168), offer of the arghya water after repeating over it the Gāyatrī-mantra (a rite which flings the three crores of goblins, named Mandehas, into a far-off dvīpa, when they make their daily war on the Sun), the japa (muttering the Gāyatrī a number of times, after doing a number of prāṇāyāmas, preceded by the praṇava) and the upasthāna, i.e., the worship, by recitation of appropriate ṛks of Mitra in the morning, Varuṇa in the evening, and the Sun in the noon rite.

The mantras have to be recited, after mentioning, as enjoined in the Paribhāṣāparva the names of the ṛṣi, metre and devatā.

The Brāhmaṇa who performs the sandhyās scrupulously does not lose his varṇa if he reincarnates (p. 162). The sages attained longevity by long continuance of sandhyā performance (p. 179). He who does not understand (avijñāta) the sandhyā and he who omits their performance are in effect S'ūdras, and are to be excluded from sharing in all rites of the twice-born (p. 180). How can any one be termed a Brāhmaṇa, who, born as such, omits the sandhyā ? A righteous king should make such Brāhmaṇas do the work of S'ūdras (p. 181). The rite should be done silently ; he who does so constantly dwells in heaven for a thousand years of the gods. The heart of the prayer is the Sāvitrī mantra, in which the Brahmacārin is initiated at the Upanayana. Though not expressly stated, the meaning and significance of the Gāyatrī and of the various mantras must be taught to the acolyte by the guru, for, as stated by Yāska, he who merely recites the Veda without grasping its purport is a mere pillar to carry a burden.

TENDING THE FIRE (AGNIKĀRYAM)
(PARVA, VIII, PP. 183-184)

The Brahmacārī should daily tend the fire by dropping into it bits of fuel (samit) collected by himself, in day-time, and after doing so he should worship the Fire (Agni), the Sun (Sūrya), the Moon (Candra) Soma, Mitra, Vāyu, Varuṇa and Brahman. It is optional to do the rite twice, once in the morning and once in the evening, but the evening performance is compulsory through out the duration of Brahmacarya. Hārīta tells a story as to why the student should worship the Fire. Once upon a time Death seized the Brahmacārin, whom the Fire (Agni) released from the clutches of Death ; hence to keep off Death, the Brahmacārin must continue the worship of the Fire.

ABHIVĀDANA—UPASAṀGRAHAṆA (SALUTATION)
(PARVA, IX, PP. 185-197)

The learning of proper demeanour is a chief duty of the student. The first is showing reverence to those to whom honor is due. It is signified by prostration followed by the recitation of the name and gotra of the saluting person, and ending with the clasping the feet (saṁgrahaṇa) of the person saluted. The entire proceeding is known as abhivādana. Salutations are: merely making prostration or saying namaḥ, getting up in honor of a person (prattyutthāna), saluting (abhivādana), upasaṁgrahaṇa (clasping the feet of the saluted person) and return of the salutation (pratyabhivādana). The student should make the salutation when he has bathed and is pure. After doing his sandhyā he should salute elders (guravaḥ), including his teacher. The salutation consists first in making a prostration, and then after getting up, taking the cupped palms to both ears, and reciting his name and gotra, with the exordium 'I salute' (abhivādaye), and ending with Bho, to draw the attention of the person saluted. He should then bend and bring the cupped right hand or both hands to the feet of the saluted person. The person, who has been saluted thus, should reciprocate by calling the name of the saluting person, and giving him a benediction. This is known as pratyabhivādanam. Women (who are fit for salutation) other than the mother and the wife of the Teacher should be saluted by simply repeating "I salute" without mentioning name and gotra. The saluter must cross his hands (vyastapāṇī), when touching the saluted person's feet (p. 187), so that his right-hand touches the right foot and the left-hand the left foot (Baudhāyana, p. 188). The ears are covered "to compose the mind" (manas-samādhānārtham). Touching the feet need not be done to the ācārya every time, after it has been done once in the morning after sunrise (p. 188).

Abhivādana, according to Āpastamba (D.S., I, 5, 12-13), may be of three kinds: nitya (obligatory), naimittika (occasional) and kāmya (undertaken for a desired end). Saluting elders, when they return home (proṣya) after a journey, is naimittika; salutation of the Guru is nitya; and saluting an employer is kāmya. In the same way, in a kanyādāna, gift of a daughter in marriage, the father of the girl has to salute the bridegroom, who may be much younger, because he is the recipient of a gift (dāna). Manu and Yama give an esoteric explanation for saluting elders: a young man's prāṇāḥ (vital airs) mount upwards, as if to leave him, when an elder approaches, and they go back to their normal position, when the elder is duly honoured, (p. 190). The moral is that one owes it to himself to show honor to those to whom honor is due.

There lies a duty on the person saluted to return the salutation by a benediction. One who does not know how to make the return honour (pratyabhivādana) need not be saluted by an abhivādana. Courtesy may be simply shown to him by rising from one's seat, as he approaches, (Manu, II, 126, p. 186), or he may be treated as a S'ūdra. Courtesy should beget courtesy.

Opinion is divided among authorities as to whether both palms should be taken to the ears by the saluter or only the right palm. Madanapārijāta (p. 27) reserves the first to learned men.[1]

Certain relations are entitled to abhivādana, e.g., brothers or other close relations of mother and father (p. 189), elder brother, teachers other than the guru, but including teachers of laukika or worldly subjects, like Arthas'āstra (p. 191), father-in-law and the presiding priest (ṛtvik, p. 192). In the salutation of the husband by the wife in marriage, the need for adherence to the rule of reciprocity or pratyabhivādana does not arise (p. 192) according to Lakṣmīdhara, who thereby adheres to the view of Gautama, who refers to an alternative view (Gautama, VI, 6).

During accidental or specific impurity neither offering nor receiving salutation is permissible, as for instance in as'auca of either party or if one has been polluted by entry into a cremation ground or by touch of an aspṛs'ya (untouchable) like a caṇḍāla.

A Brāhmaṇa of good conduct (suyantritaḥ) who knows only the Sāvitrī is acceptable (varam) for salutation but not one who eats everything, sells all things (sarvās'ī, sarvavikrayī) and does not restrain his inclinations to break the rules (p. 190).

In regard to women, the mother and grandmother, mother's sister, elder brother's wife and mother-in-law should be saluted, —as well as wives of the teacher who are of savarṇa (of the Brāhmaṇa caste), by abhivādana as well as upasāṁgrahaṇa, but in the case of young women, if the saluter is over the adolescent age, the clasping of the feet must not be done. It is in line with the prohibition of helping the young wife of the teacher at her toilet and of other undesirable acts of intimacy. In the case of wives of the teacher, who are not of his varṇa, it will be enough if respect is shown to them by getting up from the seat on their approach (p. 192). When the officiating priest, the father-in-law, paternal uncle and maternal uncle are met, it is sufficient to honour them by addressing them (abhibhāṣaṇa, p. 193) and utthāna (rising from the seat), and they need not receive abhivādana. In saluting persons in a group, they should be saluted in the order of their age, and their wives in the order of the husbands' ages.

[1] अभिवादनं हस्तद्वयेन कार्यमन्यथाकरणे विष्णुना दोषसंकीर्तनात्—'जन्मप्रभृति यत्किंचिच्चेतसा धर्ममाचरेत्। सर्वं तन्निष्फलं याति एकहस्ताभिवादनात्' इति। एतदपि विद्वद्विषयम्॥ (मदनपारिजात, २७)

The rules of abhivādana refer to salutation of those of the same varṇa or caste. A Brāhmaṇa should not salute a Kṣatriya or one of lower varṇa. When one of superior varṇa is met by one of a lower varṇa, the latter must first offer salutation to the former, who should return it by an enquiry in the appointed form: i.e., about his prosperity and health (p. 196). The knowledge, good record—(karma) and guṇa (good qualities) of such a person are irrelevant. A classical example of an apparent violation of the rule occurs in the Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, III, 3, which mentions that Hanumān, who had been sent by Sugrīva to meet S'rī Rāma and his brother, in the guise of a bhikṣu, salutes them, after approaching them reverentially,

> Tataḥ Hanumān sa vācā s'lakṣaṇayā sumanojñayā ।
> Vinītavadupāgamya Raghavau praṇipatya ca ॥
> Ābabhāṣe . . .

saluted them and spoke. A bhikṣu is a sanyāsin and a Brāhmaṇa, and neither can salute Kṣatriyas who are householders (gṛhastha). Hanumān's lapse is explained by commentators as due to his being overcome by the splendour of their appearance, or forgetting that he was in disguise, or by taking bhikṣu to mean (as is not permissible) as a mendicant Brahmacārin, who would also be precluded from saluting Kṣatriyas.

It is not proper to attempt a salutation when one is engaged in bhikṣā, is carrying a water-pot, or holding flowers etc., in his hands, or carrying food or fuel-sticks (samidh) or fire, or interrupting a japa one is engaged in, or when one is a member of an assembly (pariṣad, samavāya, p. 195). He must not offer a salutation sitting in a carriage nor on a raised place (p. 194). Nor should he continue talking to one person when he is being saluted by another. In accosting S'ūdras, he should remember to do so only after he has had his food (p. 196). Omission to make an enquiry of the welfare of the person saluting makes the negligent person share in any demerit which has accrued to the saluter. Hence one must put a junior or an inferior at ease by making a kind enquiry first (pūrvabhāsī). The condescension is a mark of high breeding. S'rī Rāma is described as having had this virtue. If one meets a woman in the forest, she must be reassured by speaking to her first (p. 198). To speak to a S'ūdra who passes by without saluting him (apraṇamate s'ūdre) is for a Brāhmaṇa to join him in perdition. The S'ūdra who, through pride of position or authority or learning, neglects to honor a Brāhmaṇa commits the equivalent of an inexpiable sin (mahāpātakatulya).

GROUNDS OF HONOR (MĀNYAKĀRAṆA)

By showing respect to persons to whom it is due, a man does his duty by himself and by society. This is why it is one of the first duties taught by the teacher to the student (brahmacārin) to cultivate the habit of honoring deserving persons (Taittirīya Upaniṣad, I, 11). Honor is shown to a person by standing up when he approaches, by waiting to be spoken to, by saluting him according to his varṇa and relationship, by circumambulating him (pradakṣiṇīkṛtya), by making him walk in front, and by offering him madhuparka (which is the highest honor that can be shown) or flowers, or sandal. Besides enumerating those whose relationship or position makes their claim to honor obvious [e.g., parents, elder brother, wives of the father other than the mother, elder sister, elder sister's husband, father's contemporary and friend, teacher (guru), preceptor (ācārya), uncles, both paternal and maternal, and parents-in-law] the relative position of all those one must honor is discussed in smṛtis. It is not enough for a brahmacārin, who, though subjected to an ascetic discipline for his own good in the teacher's household (gurukula), has still to move with others even in the first ās'rama and to be prepared for social intercourse later on as a householder, to be content with a mere learning of the Vedas and books. This is why the Guru is enjoined by the Taittirīya Upaniṣad to commence instruction in high morals and social demeanour as soon as possible after upanayana.[1] A teacher who is satisfied with imparting mere book-learning is missing an important duty, if he fails to instruct the pupil in the rules of good manners. Lakṣmīdhara devotes four parvas to the topic, including the reciprocal duties of teacher and pupil.

In an educational atmosphere the veneration of the teacher is the most obvious feature, and all other persons to be honored are measured to the pupil against the guru. This is why Devala mentions (p. 199) ten Gurus: teacher, father, elder brother, the king (mahīpatiḥ), maternal uncle, father-in-law, employer (trātā) or protector, paternal and maternal grandfathers, paternal uncle and superior in caste (varṇajyesṭha). Their wives are equal to wives of the teachers, to whom the same respect is due as to the teachers, with one addition, viz., foster-mother (dhātrī).

Hārīta explains that service of the 'Guru' (guru-s'us'rūṣā) is undertaken for the acquisition of wisdom (jñāna) and two puruṣārthas, viz., Dharma and Artha i.e., fulfilment of duties and acquisition of wealth and well-being. Gurus are 'of the earth' or 'of heaven' (bhūmiṣṭha and diviṣṭha). Agni and other deities are the gurus in heaven; service to them takes the form of japa, homa and arcanā. The mundane gurus are parents etc. Hārīta's list of them includes the ascetic, the king and seniors in age, wisdom and austerities. Lakṣmīdhara pointedly explains that "rājā" means "ruler of the earth" and not a Kṣatriya ruler only.

[1] वेदमनूच्याचार्योऽन्तेवासिनमनुशास्ति । सत्यं वद । धर्मं चर । स्वाध्यायान्मा प्रमदः । आचार्याय प्रियं धनमाहृत्य प्रजा तन्तुं मा व्यवच्छेत्सीः । सत्यान्न प्रमदितव्यम् । धर्मान्न प्रमदितव्यम् । कुशलान्न प्रमदितव्यम् । भूत्यै न प्रमदितव्यम् । स्वाध्यायप्रवचनाभ्यां न प्रमदितव्यम् । देवपितृकार्याभ्यां न प्रमदितव्यम् । मातृदेवो भव । पितृदेवो भव । आचार्यदेवो भव । अतिथिदेवो भव । यान्यनवद्यानि कर्माणि । तानि सेवितव्यानि । नो इतराणि ॥ (तैत्तरीयोपनिषत्, १, ११)

Honor or deference is shown to the Guru by not sitting with him, arguing with him, and by not displaying towards him anger, harsh speech, pride (utseka), playfulness, laughter, and love tokens (p. 200) : that is signs of familiarity. Hating the Guru for any reason is most sinful (p. 200). Among the Gurus, five are pre-eminent : mother, father, teacher, elder brother and supporter (bhartā). They should be served even at the sacrifice of one's life (prāṇatyāgena), especially a master, whose food has been eaten (p. 201). The parents and the teacher are those most entitled to every honor, service and sacrifice, and of them the mother stands first (p. 202). Among virtues the love to the mother is supreme.

Viṣṇu includes among gurus he who prevents one from committing an unrighteous act. To a woman the only guru is the husband.

What are the things the possession of which entitles to honor ? Smṛtis agree in counting these as five : learning, age, wealth, relationship and conduct ; but they differ as to their relative importance. Manu puts wealth lower than all the others ; Vasiṣṭha places it above all but 'learning', i.e., above age, relationship and rectitude. Lakṣmīdhara reconciles the conflict by ruling that the superiority of wealth is applicable only to wealth acquired in legitimate ways and destined for righteous uses (p. 203) ; the high, middle and low position given to karma by Manu, Gautama and Vasiṣṭha should be explained as referring to action that reflects devotion of spirit in which it is done (s'raddhā), in its being done in accordance with the direction of men learned in the Veda and of one's own inclination respectively. He also explains that the respect due to mere age is for one in the nineties (das'amyāvasthā).

The drift of the gradation of gurus entitled to honor is to show that the student is not to be taught to despise, because of the ascetic discipline he is subjected to in his educational interest, wealth and position, as well as kinship. The stage of studentship is a preparation for life in the family and society and under an organized government, and not merely for the ultimate Freedom, to which further training in life is needed. The emphasis on learning and conduct is just. The veneration due to great age is signified in the usual picturesque form by saying that even a S'ūdra in his nineties is entitled to veneration from advija (p. 204).

Consideration for others, as may be their due, is to be learned early. This is why " rules of priority on the road " are indicated, which show consideration to age, sex, infancy, illness, burdens and the unrestrained nature of a horse-drawn chariot (Vasiṣṭha, p. 204). It may recall to mind Muhammad's admonition to respect the man with a burden and the bearers of a bier. Similarly the dumb, the blind, the insane, the drunken man and the boy are entitled to be given priority in traffic. The inclusion of the prostitute (puṁs'calī) and the outcaste (patita) among these, as entitled to priority on the road, may be explained on the ground of their being moral derelicts. Pregnant women are to be given priority too, as well as the snātaka (the graduated Brahmacārin), the sanyāsin, and those who excel in learning, art, and good qualities (vidyā-s'ilpa-guṇa-prakṛṣṭa). Women must be allowed to use the road before men. The man of the lower varṇa must make way for one of the higher. The bride takes precedence of every one, and way must be made for her when she is taken home after marriage (p. 205). The king takes precedence of every one except the snātaka. The completion of the period of training as student, with its strict regimen, is to be treated as an event of not mere individual but of social significance. One more properly trained recruit to organized society such as the snātaka is, and a prospective citizen-householder, who will uphold the social order, must have the importance of his worth recognized. It is homage to the potentialities of the trained Brahmacārin, as well as a tribute to his success in coming to the end of a long term of rigorous discipline.

The relative gradation in honor of various gurus is further considered in parva 11, (pp. 206-210). The 'teachers' are graded in this order, each succeeding one being higher than the preceding: he who teaches one Veda or some aṅga, as a matter of livelihood (upādhyāya); he who performs all the saṁskāras from procreation to upanayana (guru) : and he who 'gives' the Veda to the initiated (upanīta) boy, i.e. ācārya. The man of rectitude and Vedic learning is the equal of the ācārya in the claim for honor. One ācārya is worth ten upādhyāyas, a picturesque way of signifying the superior status of the giver of continuous Vedic training of what we would now term continuity of academic life. He who is master of the Purāṇic lore and the Veda is called a mahāguru or pravara (p. 208), which is a way of indicating the value of this literature in education. The ṛtvik is he who guides the performance of sacrifices great and small and makes it possible for Vaidika-karma to be done.

The idea that the best instruction is that given from the mother's knees and from the father is signified picturesquely by placing the mother at the head of teachers, and the father below her, but above all formal instructors (p. 209).[1] The mother bears the son, and feeds him (dhāraṇī poṣanī ca, p. 209). A son will not get expiation for not showing honor and affection to a mother, except by the performance of the sautrāmaṇī sacrifice.

The emphasis of natural duty to parents is countered by stressing the value of the gift of spiritual life above that of mere life. A son is often the by-product of the satisfaction of a sex-urge (kāma). In physical production there is not the deliberate intention of making the 'new born' fit for eternity, which lies behind the initiation into S'āvitrī, the forerunner of Vedic knowledge (Brahma). The teacher who generates one's Vedic knowledge and consciousness of duty is his father, though he may be younger in age (p. 210). Seniority among Brāhmaṇas is by learning, by heroism among Kṣatriyas, by large possessions among Vais'yas, and by age only in the case of S'ūdras. A man's worth is to be measured by reference to the standard of his specific duties in the social plan of varṇās'rama (p. 210). The stability and success of the social order can be ensured only by this lesson being learned as early as possible by every member of of society. Instruction in the scale of social value is thus part of the training of the Brahmacārin.

RELATIONS OF TEACHER AND STUDENT (GURVĀCĀRYĀNUVṚITTIḤ) (PARVA 12)

The determination of the proper relation of teacher and pupil is based on a mixture of ethical and educational grounds. It is illustrated in the excerpts furnished in this parva.

[1] Lakṣmīdhara cites (p. 209) Nāradasmṛti's verse placing the father above the mother, without comment. The priority of the father is for inheritance, not for love or veneration.

To begin with the educational duties of the acolyte. He should not press the teacher to begin instruction but must be ready to do so, as soon as he is called to take it. During the lecture, he should give his concentrated attention to what the teacher teaches. After the lecture, he should mentally recall what has been taught, and think over difficulties met in the exposition. It is only when he is not thus engaged that he will attend to the business of the teacher. He should attend to both duties without prompting (p. 215). He should obtain (by his effort in questioning the teacher) the knowledge he desires, as a digger of the earth finds water (p. 216). He should not be sleep during instruction (p. 219). He should rise before the teacher (pūrvotthāyī) and retire to bed after him. He can ask his teacher for enlightenment on any topic under instruction, but if he is unable to follow the teacher's words, he should be patient, (p. 224) i.e., not hold the teacher to blame for his own dulness.

A teacher should not refuse to teach, when asked to do so. A teacher who becomes an outcaste has no tie with his student (p. 217). His words will be law to the pupil, unless they contravene Dharma (p. 219, anyatra pātakāt). The pupil is bound to give up a teacher whose conduct is tainted (p. 223), as also one who neither studies the Veda himself nor teaches it. The teacher should assiduously fill the ears of the student with the Veda (Manu, II, 144). The teaching may include besides the Veda, worldly matter as well as philosophy (p. 224). His claim to the homage to the pupil lasts as long as instruction lasts (p. 226).

The personal relationship between teacher and student, their identity, which the Taittirīyā Upaniṣad holds up as the teacher's first declaration to the initiate, and which is signified in the ritual of initiation when the teacher places his pupil's hand over his heart,[1] is capable of improvement only when the pupil conducts himself with such silent devotion to the personal service of the teacher, and moulds his demeanour in such a way as to win the teacher's affection and interest. The hardest part of the scholastic discipline to a young acolyte will be the continuous personal service, and domestic drudgery. It is to overcome this feeling and habituate the pupil to do the service readily and heartily, that the value, spiritually, of such service and devotion and of an attitude of veneration towards the teacher that they are lauded as a poor return to the spiritual gifts that are made by the teacher. The circumstance that such service is unremunerated, as a teacher cannot teach for a fee that has been settled beforehand, will make it easier to the pupil to recognize his obligation. The rules of demeanour with which the section is full—like not extending his feet towards the teacher, not sitting when the guru stands, not laughing or playing in his presence, not engaging in idle talk, inattention, and controlling involuntary bodily movements etc.—are aimed at creating the atmosphere not only for proper study and instruction but for the production of a feeling of attachment to the pupil in the guru.

[1] The initiating guru places his palm above the heart of the pupil and recites ;
मम व्रते ते हृदयं दधामि मम चित्तमनुचित्तं ते अस्तु । मम वाचमेकमना जुषस्व बृहस्पतिष्ट्वा नियुनक्तु मह्यम् —(पारस्करगृह्यसूत्र, २, २, १८)

The same words are repeated by the bridegroom (in the wedding ceremony) to the bride substituting Prajāpatiṣṭva for Bṛhaspatiṣṭvā (Ibid., I, 8, 8). The relations between teacher and pupil are like those between husband and wife, permanent and indissoluble.

The conclusion of the period of study enables the student to return to his family. Some of the strict rules of student's ascetic life are then relaxed. But even then, when he visits his old teacher, he should comport himself as of old. This is enforced by Lakṣmīdhara by bringing the rules of the conduct of the samāvṛtta or snātaka in the exposition of the relations of pupil and teacher. The devotion of the student to his teacher is pictured as so complete that when the teacher's teacher comes, in the presence of the teacher, respect is still first shown only to the teacher and to the other only with the teacher's permission, a reversal of the domestic position in the family circle when the father and grandfather are both present. The completion of studies still entails reverence to all those who are treated as equal to teachers e.g., parents, near relations, ṛtvik etc. (p. 225). Two grown-up persons reciprocally instructing each other are not to observe to the relations of teacher and pupil (p. 226).

In a short section (parva 13) the relation to the sons and wives of the teacher are defined. The teacher's son is entitled to veneration but not to bodily service like shampooing ; a very senior fellow student is entitled to honor (p. 227). While the wives of the teacher are entitled to honor like the teacher, Manu warns the pupil against touching their bodies, or helping in their toilet. The passions are difficult of control and women can lead one astray. Even the learned succumb to temptation (p. 228).

RESTRAINT OF THE SENSE ORGANS (INDRIYA-NIGRAHAḤ)

The description of the attitude of caution to be observed by a pupil to women in the teacher's home, in which he has to dwell during the whole period of education, leads naturally to a separate section on the control of the senses. The teacher lives a family life, and in a joint-family there will be others who do so in the joint-home, in which the brahmacārin is received. He must therefore be specifically warned against imitating those who have more freedom from their gārhasthya. The ordinary Dharma consists of yama and niyama. There are special rules of restraint for the Brahmacārin, which constitute his specific niyamas. The object of cultivating the restraint is to promote the growth of austerity (tapovṛddhi), according to Manu, but the habits (from a secular standpoint) are such as promote undivided attention to study and mental concentration as well as the conservation of physical vigor. The first of the vows is celibacy, which has become identified with Brahmacarya in common usage. Daily baths (in cold water), the regular performance of the rites to the gods, manes and sages, the adoration of the gods, the tending of the fire (samidādhanam), the attention to the daily studies and the personal service of the teacher, besides collection of the material for daily homa (kus'a, samidh) fill a student's day completely and leave him no time for anything else. Occupation in the fullest sense is the preventive of moral slackness. He is to overcome sleep (jitanidraḥ), languor (nirālasya) and anger (p. 230). He should not wear flowers, garlands, use perfumes or ointments for the eye (añjanam), or bee's wax (as a lip-salve) or take oil-baths or eat sweet fruit (s'uktāni) or essences (rasa), honey and flesh. He should forswear cruelty to animals—a weakness of boyhood. He should not wear shoes or use an umbrella. (He has already forsworn jewellery). He should avoid gossip, controversies, gaming with dice and lying, as well as dancing or witnessing dances, and music (vocal and instrumental). He should sleep by himself in a bed of kus'a grass spread on the ground, and not use cots or seats. He should not discharge retus (semen) voluntarily. He should collect his daily bhikṣā and eat it. He must shun the sight of nude women, and avoid looking at (or returning the glances of) women, conversation with them or all physical contact with them. He must cultivate the power to bear without fatigue his hard life of austerity. He should scrupulously avoid all things or acts which are forbidden by the s'āstras (p. 230).

FURTHER RULES FOR THE BRAHMACĀRIN
(PARVA, 15, PP. 231-239)

Precedence having been given to the enunciation of the means of self-control, as the main objective in securing the disciplined life of the student, the subject is developed further in a separate parva, in view of its importance. The prohibition of sex intercourse is repeated, and as a means of securing it, even conversation with women is prohibited except for 'necessary' purposes (yāvadartham, p. 232), and their touch (spars'a) is also interdicted. The prohibition to witness dancing (nṛtta), hear music and to sing, and to use perfumes, lip-salve (necessary to prevent cracked lips in the winter cold of North India) as well as all types of personal decoration are directed by the same motive. Temptations to break the rule of sexual continence are not distant things for a student living in the large household of a married teacher, and the need for care is all the greater to prevent anything that might lead to its breach. Flowers and garlands are necessary for daily worship; the Brahmacārin may use them for such purposes alone, as pointed out by Mitramis'ra (p. 231). Like a soldier wearing his uniform for purposes of easy recognition of his profession, the student is enjoined to go about with his staff, water vessel (kamaṇḍalu) leather upper-garment (ajina), girdle (mauñjī), or waist string (ras'anā) and sacred thread (yajñopavīta), and he is not to do any of his religious rites (vrata) without all of them. His head should be shaved completely (muṇḍa) or his tuft (s'ikhā) should be matted, and the rest of the head shaved. His nails should not be pared (p. 235). The aim is obviously to render his appearance not a source of self-satisfaction or of allure to those of the other sex. While he should bathe by complete immersion, he is not to swim or sport in water. He may stand by and even assist in any useful action done by S'ūdras or women in the house, such as cleaning the floor, washing it, etc. He should not eat manufactured salt. He should not eat any food which has not been mentally dedicated to deities (anuddes'ya). He should not hear his own praise, for, according to Manu (II, 162) a Brāhmaṇa should welcome criticism like nectar and avoid eulogy like poison. He who cultivates the love of praise or popularity will not find it easy to keep strictly to his own standards. In speech he should be restrained and agreeable, and speak low. He should not hurt any living being unnecessarily; ahiṃsā is an eternal law (p. 233). He should not mind derision (avamāna) or retort, when insulted, for he can sleep in peace, only if he dees not take the insult to heart, and the offender will surely perish (p. 233). As the cow by eating sweet grass is nourished, so by his japa and homa, a student is satisfied (p. 233). Austerity (Tapas) to the student is synonymous with adherence to the rules of his life (niyameṣu tapas's'abdaḥ, p. 337). These rules include his daily alms-collection and maintenance of the sacred fire (agnīndhana, p. 236). The student should not partake of food at a s'rāddha unless invited to take part in it (p. 230). He should not eat stale food, or what is left after another person has eaten (ucciṣṭha). Sleeping by day, which is condemned for all, is specially interdicted to the student (p. 232). His thoughts should not dwell on women; nor should he desire a woman. He is to avoid riding in chariots or on horses or elephants, climbing trees or difficult places, swimming wide rivers like the Ganges, descending wells, or attempting any difficult or risky feats (mahāsāhasa, p. 234). Among the last is association with teachers who are enemies of the State (viruddha; i.e., rājādi-dviṣta-gurvās'rayaṇam). This is another significant indication of the student's social obligation. Devotion to his studies and strict adherence to niyamas are the things that would not only please his guru but contribute to his own material and spiritual welfare (p. 238). Austerity (tapas) and learning (vidyā) are like a chariot and its horses; there will be movement only when they are associated (p. 239). Success in study accrues from discipline. Devala points out that three sources of happiness in this world and beyond it are wealth, learning and austerity, and all the three must be sought together.

WHO CAN BE TAUGHT (ADHYĀPYA)?
(PARVA 16, PP. 240-243)

A teacher should not admit any casual applicant without enquiry. Nor should he reject him summarily. When the father initiates the son, he should make him learn the Veda and Dharmas'āstra (Manvādikam). A teacher who has retained a pupil for over a year without instructing him in the Veda receives all the evil that accrues to the boy (p. 240). This rule allows an interval of a year between the reception of a pupil, after initiation, and the real commencement of studies. Āpastamba thus describes the duties of the teacher: he should love the pupil like a son; he should be very attentive to the pupil's needs; he should teach him all he can of the sacred science, without withholding any part of it; he should not employ the pupil in his own work when the distraction will prejudice the studies of the pupil, When he neglects these duties he ceases to be a teacher (guru). According to Manu, ten persons will have to be given instruction in the Veda on request: the teacher's teacher's son, a pupil who wishes to do service (s'us'rūṣā); one who offers to impart him knowledge (of something the teacher does not already know); one who is anxious to fulfil his Dharma, a person of pure character, a relation, a friend, one who helps with money (but not as payment for instruction) and a man of probity. Many of the ten will be much above the age of entry to Brahmacarya. Yājñavalkya mentions moral qualities like gratitude etc., as recommendations for acceptance of a pupil; they can be tested only in grown-up pupils. The smṛtis allow a person to continue his studies under other teachers, after initiation and entry into Veda; and it is such subsequent teachers that are contemplated in these rules of Manu and Yājñavalkya. A fundamental doctrine of Indian education is that knowledge should be imparted according to the fitness of the recipient (adhikāra) which must be made out from his varṇa, ancestry, nature and previous equipment. Knowledge is power; and power should not be given to those who will not use it properly, i.e., for the good of all. In such subjects as medicine or archery (Dhanurveda) or Mantras'āstra a careful enquiry into the disposition and record of the would-be pupil is obligatory in the social interest. The rule of Viṣṇu that one should not sacrifice for, or teach one who has not been examined and found to merit the help is of wide applicability. In the case of a boy who comes for initiation, it will be only his parentage, varṇa and gotra that will form the subject of questioning, as in the case of Jābāla Satyakāma in Chāndogya Upaniṣad. A patita's son and a vrātya's son cannot be initiated, even though they might be descended from dvija families. The Gāyatrī and the Veda are sacred possessions, and should not be handed to all and sundry. Āpastamba (p. 243) describes how the teacher might discharge this duty of preliminary enquiry into the caste and record of conduct of the aspirant to brahmacarya or to further learning. The sacred fire should be kindled and in its presence the applicant should be questioned as to his caste and conduct, and if he declares that he is of a good family and conduct, the teacher must then recite a mantra addressed to Vāyu and Āditya praying to them to vouch for the goodness of the applicant and declare him free from contamination. In the Chāndogya Upaniṣad, Jābāla could not specify his gotra, as his mother in her struggle to live, had not remembered it, and he says so. His ingenuousness satisfies the teacher, who immediately declares him (from his honesty) to be a Brāhmaṇa and orders him to procure a samidh (fuel-stick) so that his initiation might begin. Because he cannot get pupils with desirable qualifications, a teacher should not accept those with doubtful qualifications! One should not sow on infertile soil! (p. 242). Vidyā is not the property of the teacher but a 'deposit' held by him, and it should be given only to its real (moral) owner. By giving it to an envious person, who does not follow the rules of studentship, its strength is lost (Manu, II, 115, p. 242). The verse of Manu is a paraphrase of a very old saying found in Chāndogya Brāhmaṇa (p. 242 f.n.) and the Nirukta (II, iv, 1).[1] The appeal put into the mouth of Vidyā is educationally more appropriate, as the teacher is besought not to bestow learning on one who is envious, dishonest (anṛjave) and idle. Hārīta's exhortation that learning should be imparted only to the strong-minded pupil, who will zealously serve the teacher, and be devoted to his studies and Dharma, and only to the pupil of zeal (s'raddhayā) winds up with the warning not to teach the boastful, inwardly corrupt (antarduṣṭe) and those of evil disposition (duḥkhas'īla.)

The teacher is entitled to punish the pupil for derelictions but not so as to hurt him. Only a rope, or light cane alone can be used to strike the fatty portions of the body, like the buttocks. Flogging on other parts of the frame will entail punishment for assault. (p. 243). The pupil is on a level with the wife, son, slave, servant (preṣya) and brother (younger) who can be struck with light bamboos for proved offences, but whose flogging will make the head of the family liable to punishment in his turn by the king.

RULES FOR INSTRUCTION IN THE VEDA
(ADHYĀPANAVIDHIḤ)

In the recitation of the Veda the utmost care has to be taken to keep to the accent and mātrā (elongation of sound), and to begin, continue and end it properly. Otherwise bad results are predicted. Some of the essential preliminaries have been indicated in paribhāṣā parva. Every Vedic lesson must begin with the utterance of " Oṁ " which, along with the Gāyatrī, is said to have been brought out of the three Vedas by the Creator (p. 249). The pupil must first make himself fit for the lesson by a bath, and performance of gāyatrī, after sipping water (ācamana) and putting on a pavitra (ring of kus'a). He must wait to be called for instruction ; and when called take his seat in front of, or to the right of the teacher, after abhivādana and upasaṁgrahaṇa. If the teacher is away from home, and the daily recitation has to be done in his absence, it must commence in the same way, but after saluting the wife of the teacher (p. 246). The pupil should sit with his hands on his knees during the lesson, in an attitude of concentrated attention (nānymatiḥ) so that his mind might not wander from the subject. He should then request the teacher to begin; or the teacher may command the student to begin his recapitulation. When the teacher finds the need for a pause, he may end the lecture, when " Oṁ " will be repeated again, and the upasamgrahaṇa of the teacher will be done by the pupil. During the discourse, the pupil should keep his fingers on the ground (p. 246). Hārīta classifies thus the " troubles " to a successful lesson. (1) From the standpoint of the instructor (granthbhṛt), they are: liability to be heard by all (sarvas'rāvaṇam) including those not entitled to hear the Veda; crooked arguments; objection on the ground of irrelevance; lack of attention to metre in recitation; naming the teacher; praise of non-esoteric knowledge (arahasya-khyāpanam); and questions at wrong places. (2) From the standpoint of the lesson they are: learning without proper attention to prior ritual or restraint (niyama), failure to serve the teacher (a-gurus'us'rūṣā), teaching for a fee (which is prohibited) and dislike of the teacher by the pupil. (3) From the standpoint of the pupil the faults are the instruction of persons who are not born in wedlock or are children of outcastes, the bringing in of worldly matters prominently in the discourse, and collecting a fee for teaching. From every standpoint the faults are excessive brevity, prolixity, inaudibleness, omission of letter, class (varṇa) syllable, or of their enunciation clearly and properly, and the bringing in of un-Vedic words and enunciating words incompletely. The careless repetition of the Veda in a discourse or lesson will deprive it of its lustre, fruit and religious efficacy. This is why the faults possible are specified so that they might be avoided by teacher and learner. It is only a faultless Vedic recitation that produces the desired effects.

Interruptions to Vedic Study
(Anadhyāyāḥ, Parva XVIII, pp. 250-261)

So much sanctity is attached to the Veda that its first learning by a brahmacārin is restricted to places, occasions and times which are not classed as unsuitable, and therefore inauspicious. In such cases there is either total interruption of the lesson, as if it is on an unsuitable place like a cremation ground, or interruption for certain specified periods of time. Thus, if the learner or teacher is subjected to death-impurity (as'auca) the interruption is for the full period of impurity, e.g., twelve days, when the as'auca springs from the death of a near relation, (jñāti). Certain days are definitely marked as excluded for the teaching: aṣṭakas, parvas, caturdas'i (s'ukla) etc., as well as the days of upākarma etc. They are predictable beforehand. But sudden and unexpected incidents, human and natural, may necessitate the suspension. Among human interruptions are as'auca, the death of the ruler of the region, or even the head of the province (viṣayapati) or the army (sainikādhipati, p. 251), the death of a great man, the death of a family-friend (kulamitra), the death of a fellow student and the death of the teacher himself. Among unforeseen natural events are the sight of a rainbow at night, earth-tremors or earth-quakes, comets, shooting stars, "fire in the sky" (ulkā), meteors, eclipses, and lightning and thunder. Among academic reasons for interruption are the absence of one or more students (as the recitation cannot be begun again for their sake, after their return), the absence of the teacher himself, or illness of pupil or teacher, or the lesson reaching the end of a section (p. 256). Among ill portents is the fall of an idol in the village, which will cause an interruption (p. 257). No teaching or learning is allowable when one of the parties has officiated at a s'rāddha. When a person who has misbehaved with a woman of lower varṇa or the woman concerned has been seen or sees the students, or when there are S'ūdras present, or when there is confusion as from the sound of another Vedic chaunt in the neighbourhood. In regard to places to be avoided are cremation grounds, a house in which a S'ūdra, who is described as 'a walking cemetry', dwells or where there is an uncremated corpse. According to some smṛtis no Vedic teaching can be given in a town (nagara). The reason for it may be two-fold: the chance of distraction of attention and of pollution by touch or sight; and the likelihood of good Vaidīkas not being available for giving instruction within towns, which are barred to them for continued residence. The cry of a lone wolf or jackal at night or the solitary hooting of an owl will also interrupt. Teaching cannot be done at midnight.

A distinction is made between teaching and learning the Veda and the recitation of the Veda in the course of domestic or public rites and ceremonies like satras (sacrifices) and in japa and homa. The latter will not be interrupted by any cause other than actual pollution by touch or by place. Similarly, mental recapitulation by a student of verses of the Veda will not be interrupted in the cases indicated.

Longevity, progeny, cattle, merit flowing from rites, and acquired merit are destroyed by teaching the Veda on prohibited occasions and places (p. 260). A lesson given on an aṣṭamī is bad for the teacher, one given on caturdas'i for the pupil and lesson given on new-moon or full-moon days destroys intelligence. Such mystical effects are ascribed to Vedic instruction. But it is limited only to it. The teaching and learning of other subjects, like a Vedāṅga (e.g. grammar) can go on on all days and so can the mantras for daily fire rites (homa). The anadhyāya is not a general holiday for students and teachers. If it was, a considerable part of the year will be unavailable for study and teaching.

SUBJECTS OF STUDY (ADHYEYA, PARVA XIX, PP. 262-263)

It is the duty of a Brāhmaṇa to study the Veda, which is the ultimate source of Dharma, and next to it the other sources of Dharma, viz. smṛti and sadācāra (the conduct of the elect) demand his attention. The ordinary rule is that till the Veda is learned, no other subject should be; but this is impracticable, and so an exception is made in the case of the Vedāṅgas, like grammar, astronomy etc. which are needed for the fulfilment of Vedic study. Even in studying s'ruti (with its meaning) some parts like those which urge action contrary to the drift of the Veda (like those which commend the worship of burial mounds, e.g. caityas) may be dropped. So should subjects which are antagonistic to s'ruti, like Buddhist works. The dvija, who applies himself to other studies without studying the Veda, becomes a S'ūdra even in this life (p. 263).

DURATION OF STUDENTSHIP

The ancient rule (paurāṇa) for the duration of brahmacarya was twelve years for learning each Veda and forty-eight years for learning all the four. The impracticability of every one studying all Vedas the led to modifications of the rule. It is enough to learn one Veda, in which case the period will be twelve years. The Vedas prescribe the kindling of the domestic fire and its worship, after marriage, when a man's hair is still black. This rule will be violated by lifelong brahmacarya or prolonged studentship (p. 363). Accordingly they were forbidden for kaliyuga (The passage is noteworthy as the only reference to kalivarjya in the Kṛtya-kalpaṭaru). Before the conclusion of studentship, which is known as samāvartana, all the niyamas of Brahmacarya have to be observed. But in the sixteenth year. the hair on the face and body can be shaved, after a ceremony known as kes'ānta. It is preliminary to samāvartana, which itself is no vivāha, but nowadays they are all done together, one after the other.

What should happen if an ācārya dies? If his son or brother is competent the brahmacārin can adopt him as ācārya and continue in the house till his studies are finished. Otherwise he may elect another guru, under whom he may finish his studentship (p. 264).

THE FOUR ĀS'RAMA (PARVA XX, PP. 265-270)

Having dealt fully with the life of the Brahmacārin, Lakṣmīdhara proceeds to deal with the four stages of life (ās'rama) and the place of the initial ās'rama in the scheme. The four are those of the student (brahmacārin), the householder (gṛhastha), the vānaprastha (hermit) and the sanyāsin (ascetic). They normally should follow one another, and one should go through the four in a full life. But, this is not obligatory. The first ās'rama, without which one will remain equal to a S'ūdra, even if born a dvija, must be undergone. For society the first two are necessary, the first because the presence of uneducated elements among those born to be the spiritual, political and economic leaders in a community is undesirable, and the second is necessary both for the perpetuation of society and for enabling the other ās'ramas to function. It is in this sense that the smṛtis declare all ās'rmas as sprung (prabhava) of the gṛhasthās'rama. It is the person with an exceptional urge to spirituality that ordinarily undertakes the two last ās'ramas. The bulk of a community must accordingly consist of gṛhasthas. The S'ūdra is not only ekajāti (only once-born) but ekās'rami, figuratively speaking, since the ās'rama scheme is not for him.

When his period of brahmacarya is finished, the student has two courses open to him : he might continue in the family of the teacher as a life-long brahmacārin, or he may terminate his sojourn and education under the guru, by making him a guru-dakṣiṇā, to mark the formal termination of their relation. The first is named naiṣṭhika, because of his niṣṭhā (perpetual vow of celibacy) and because he has resolved to remain a student all his life. Mere continuance of celibacy will not constitute a naiṣṭhika. A student may finish his period of gurukulavāsa, with the prescribed ceremonial bath or snāna, after making his gift to the teacher, but remain unmarried all his life. It is the continued residence in the house of the guru and continuance of brahmacarya discipline that mark the naiṣṭhika. The perpetual student is thus the perfect brahmacārin. It will be open to a student, who has finished his brahmacarya period, either to prepare for marriage or become an ascetic, immediately (Lagu-Vyāsa, p. 266) if he has the urge to an ascetic life and is not afflicted by any sex inclinations (ūrdhvaretas). Manu and the bulk of authorities, on the other hand, allow the approach to the final ās'rama, only step by step, after going through the intervening stages after studentship. The Viṣṇupurāṇa indicates the three courses open to the student who has completed his training : to become a naiṣṭhika or a gṛhastha or take on the life of a vānaprastha or of a sanyāsin (p. 269). Manu divides the span of human life into four quarters, each of which is to be utilized for undertaking one stage or ās'rama (IV, 1-2 and VI, 1-2). Hārīta takes the same view. Baudhāyana regards the age of seventy as the proper one for entering on sanyāsa. No stage is superior to or inferior to the others, provided it is undertaken and adhered to in strict accordance with its rules. By doing his duty in each, one becomes holy (puṇyas'loka). "Each has its special duty and the discharge of it constitutes the ground of salvation: austerity and study of the Veda in the first, sacrifices in the second, tapas in the third and attainment of true knowledge of Reality (jñāna) in the last" (Hārīta, p. 269). In every stage one can practise brahmacarya—in the case of the first and two last stages it means complete celibacy, and in the second celibacy except during the wife's ṛtu (recurring periods of fertility, i.e., the fifth to the sixteenth day after menses appear). It therefore means in a physical sense retention of seed (retodhāraṇam). In a wider sense, as cultivation of the Veda (knowledge), it is a duty of all four ās'ramas. The chief duty of the first stage is the maintenance of the fire and following the rules of discipline: of the second, the performance of the sacrifices, beginning with the five great ones (pañcamahayajña): of the third, the maintenace of life by forest produce etc., (vanyādi): of the fourth the conquest of the feeling of egoism, (ahaṅkāra) the cultivation of the feeling of renunciation (tyāga) and abstention from injury to all beings (ahiṁsā sarva bhūtānām). The study of the Veda as well as alms-giving are duties of the second ās'rama. According to the Chāndogya Upaniṣad (viii, 5)[1] sacrifices, silence, fasting and living in the forest, all these constitute Brahmacarya, as they help the attainment of Brahma-knowledge. All carry their reward in the divine worlds (Ibid., ii, 23). Penance and fasting are the special duties of the third ās'rama (Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad, iv, 4, 22). In every ās'rama one has to practise non-injury by looking to his steps in walking, so as not to tread on any living being, to drink filtered water, to purify his speech by truth, and aim at purity of thought, (p. 270) as the surest means of salvation.

One cannot go back to the first ās'rama after undertaking the second, nor to the second after becoming a sanyāsin. A person who does so is without any ās'rama (ānās'aramī). One cannot remain for even a single day without belonging to an āsrama i.e., beyond childhood. Going back on one's āsrama (prātilomya) leads to perdition (p. 270).

The naiṣṭhika is the Brahmacārin par excellence. The duties of the ordinary student lie even more heavily on him. If his teacher is dead, he continues in the household, accepting a deserving son of the teacher as teacher, or his nearest duly-qualified agnate, or after obtaining permission of the savarṇa widow of the teacher. As the naiṣṭhika would have mastered the Veda and completed his education, it would be absurd to apply to him the scholastic regimen of the ordinary adolescent student. Hence his Vedic studies are not bound to be regular; he can study them at pleasure; he can recite the Gāyatrī, the Rudra hymns or the Upaniṣads without intending them for the benefit of the teacher or awaiting his permission; he should bathe thrice daily like the vanī and yati (savanopasparsī).[1] Being a grown-up person, he is more likely to be assailed by sex-temptations than a boy-student; accordingly, the rules forbidding every kind of intimacy with women (thirteen kinds are named on p. 272) are made stiffer and more explicit in his case. Obviously, the life will be undertaken only by those who feel a special vocation for it, and in whom the sex instincts are virtually atrophied. Mere abstention from marriage (voluntarily or involuntarily) does not make a naiṣṭhika: it is his full capacity to become a gṛhastha but voluntary renunciation of the life of a householder and choice of life-long celibacy and gurukulavāsa that mark him off from such persons as born cripples, dumb persons, blind men, dwarfs, deformed men etc., whom, for purpose of sterilization socially, Viṣṇu (as cited by Aparārka, 72) will term perpetual brahmacārins. To remain unmarried will in their case be making a virtue of necessity. It is not permissible for a naiṣṭhika to remain in the house or family of a guru, who is not a Brāhmaṇa. The implication of this restrictive rule of Manu (II, 242) is that the life is open to dvijas other than those of the first varṇa, but even then only in Brāhmaṇa households.

ESTIMATE OF THE VALUE OF THE ĀS'RAMA SCHEME

Unlike the varṇa scheme for which a divine origin is ascribed in all Sankrit literature, no clear view of the origin of the ās'rama plan is available. It is ancient undoubtedly, as allusions to the different stages occur in the Vedic saṁhitas, while the full scheme of four ās'ramas may be seen in the most important Upaniṣads, in which, however, sometimes they are taken as three either by not counting the first, as a preparation for the rest, or by not discriminating between the last two. The plan is transparently linked to the doctrine of puruṣārthas, and with their culmination in the attainment of the last of them, viz.. mokṣa. In a way the four ās'ramas seem to reflect the four varṇas, and the full four are ordinarily possible only to the Brāhmaṇa, who is dedicated to educational and spiritual service in the social scheme. It became an ideal of the life of a Kṣatriya to become a vānaprastha, but in the Mahābhārata (S'ānti-parva, XVI) there is the well-known episode of the rebuke of King Janaka by his queen, when the king renounced the world and became a bhikṣu (sanyāsin) that by doing so he had forsworn his vows as a king and thereby forfeited his claim to redemption.[1] In later times, we hear of Buddhist rulers renouncing the world, not Hindu. The life of the householder is the one logically indicated for the second and third varṇas, as their service to society will constitute their claim to mukti. He who strives for only his own redemption is ethically on a lower plane than he who looks to help every one else to his release. This is the proper sense of mumukṣu, "aspirant for mokṣa." A philosophy which emphasizes life in this world as the highest is materialistic. It overlooks man's spirituality. That every one in society should after an education, which will supply both knowledge and discipline, aim at fulfilling his mission in life is the ideal behind the ās'rama scheme. The high level of spiritual advance attained in India through the ages, while not ignoring the upkeep of the social and economic system, is the best testimony to the value of the plan. It was evolved naturally in an atmosphere charged with aspirations for mastering the truth of existence. It did not lose itself in an ideal of total renunciation, which would have spelt race suicide and economic and social ruin. That the entire life should be passed in a series of gradually intensifying stages of restraint and spirituality, in which a man, well-grounded in thought, learning and self-control, should feel more and more freed from all types of attachment to things that have no permanence in a cosmic scheme, and become fit for the realization of the highest, is behind the entire scheme. The Upaniṣadic philosophy, like all Indian thought, is the by-product of the organization in āśramas. It is natural that a student of the Upaniṣads (which a teacher had to teach in the earliest stage) should realize—even from the standpoint of a foreigner—that the entire history of man has not produced any other scheme which surpasses this in grandeur of conception and spiritual and social utility. THE LAST STAGES OF BRAHMACARYĀŚRAMA

A society which upholds the ideal of perpetual celibacy for every one will soon die out. The Hindu view is to stabilize society, not kill it. Gārhasthya is enjoined to enable a man to discharge a pre-natal debt to his ancestors: to continue the line by raising progeny. The debt to gods and sages is also discharged indirectly by marriage and raising male progeny: by providing persons who will carry on the cultural and spiritual tradition, who will discharge the debt to the sages who made such tradition, and the debt to the gods by sacrifices and prayer. This is why the culmination of Brahmacaryāśrama is that of the Gṛhastha. In fact, it is but a prolonged preparation for it. The gradual reduction of the duration of studentship, which is noticed in the smṛtis, is designed obviously not to allow asceticism to over-ride the higher obligations to God and man. The entry into the first āśrama is made with a solemnity which would leave an impression that is indelible on the susceptible mind of the boy-initiate. A similar solemnity marks the end of the period of probation as student. In the ceremony of godāna, in the sixteenth year, the Brahmacārin has shed a little of the rigor of his life by the removal of hair from his face and the removal of his matted locks. When he has come to the end of his training, he should take leave of the Guru as solemnly as he went up to him. As a tangible mark of his gratitude for a debt that can never be repaid, he offers to the guru a dakṣiṇā, or fee, in kind or in gold. He may give a thousand (i.e., a large number) of cows, or eleven oxen, if unable to afford the former, or what may obtain the favor of the Guru (guruprasāda). The gift is more symbolic than real. The ideal Guru would be above any desire for rewards for his selfless labour for the acolyte for so many years. The parental relation, which was originally a metaphor, would have become translated into something like reality in years of intimate association, and to demand a return for " parental " care would be as unnatural as in the case of natural parents in relation to their sons. In the Upaniṣads the fee is described as "priyam dhanam," that will please the teacher. The punishment that awaits an importunate and foolish pupil, who does not understand his teacher's mind, is given by Kālidāsa in the case of Kautsa, who was punished by his irate Guru, who, when importuned to specify his requirements, asked for an impossible donation, which he sought of the emperor Raghu, who helped him out by exacting it from the god of wealth.[1] " To the teacher who teaches even a single letter of the alphabet, there is nothing on earth that will be an adequate return " (p. 276). After a formal presentation and leave taking, the student takes a ritual bath (snāna) which ends his period of austerity (vrata). To mark the end, he furnishes himself with things that are forbidden during studentship: ear-rings, an umbrella, shoes, a walking stick, a water vessel, two yajñopavītas, a turban or covering for the head, garlands for the neck and flowers for the hair, sandal for the body, añjana for the eye etc. He recovers his economic and social status, which were submerged in the equality of ascetic studentship. He will not use hereafter articles like drinking vessels used by others. In fact he is now prepared for entering life.

Snāna is often identified with samāvartana or 'home-coming' of the student. This need not be so, as the student might have studied under his own father, though wisdom often dictates to fathers the selection of another teacher, in view of seeing that the rigor of discipline is not weakened by paternal affection. Marriage need not immediately follow the snāna. The snātaka or accomplished student is one who has completed his studies (vidyāsnātaka) and fulfilled the vows of Brahmacarya (vratasnātaka). The rite is therefore sometimes termed vrata-samāpti meaning the end of the vratas of Brahmacarya. He will now be liable to domestic pollution. He is now a citizen. His new duties have to be different from those of his period of education. The snātaka-dharma laid down elaborately in smṛtis will be common to the snātaka as well as the gṛhastha, who has the duties of married life super-imposed on those cf the snātaka. The parting advice of the Guru to the student, when he takes leave of him is to marry so as not to end the line of his family. It is upto the accomplished student to show the effect of his responsibilities by proceeding to take on himself the burden of the next stage in a life whose ultimate objective is salvation.

* Brahmacāri Kāṇḍa has been edited from a single manuscript, the only one so far discovered. It is very defective. Pandit Giridharlāl S'āstrī, who compared the transcript made for me at Udaipur from the original manuscript has made the following note at the end of the transcript :

मक्षिकास्थाने मक्षिकेति नियममनुसृत्यावलोकितम् । यत: प्रचीनप्रतिरप्यनति शुद्धैव । क्षन्तव्यम् ।

The concluding passage in the manuscript reads—

'करकं' कमण्डलु: । कुण्डिकामण्डलीशकुरुते । आचार्यस्य सकाशात् प्राप्नोति । अस्या विद्याचार्यस्यापि य आचार्या ते वंश्या तेऽप्यस्य ब्रह्मचारिण: आचार्या: । यानिति अस्य ब्रह्मचारिण: पश्यतः सत: यानन्यान् नत्वा गुरुरुपसंगृह्णीयात् तदा त्वेवं काले एते उपसंग्राह्या: । पैठीनसि: ब्रह्मचर्यस्यासमाप्ते: न्मृतश्चेदाचार्यो गुरुवृत्तिं समस्तां पुत्रे वर्तयेत् । अविद्यमाने पुत्रे भ्रातरि वसेत् ॥

These passages obviously form a comment on the Sūtras of Āpastamba on p. 264 infra, which stood with only a portion of the comment. They have accordingly been shifted to p. 264 and printed after the above Sūtras. The passage from Paiṭhīnasi also relates to the same topic, and has been printed after the above comments on Āpastamba's Sūtras on p. 264. It is evidently a case of the shifting of folia in the original from which the Udaipur Manuscript was copied.

As now printed, the last words of Brahmacāri Kāṇḍa are 'करकं' कमण्डलु: ॥ The usual colophons marking the termination of the parva and Kāṇḍa are missing in the manuscript. The work appears to be complete, as it stands, though it is possible that one or two citations are lost. Lakṣmīdhara deals with Snātakavratāni, on pp. 274-302 of Gṛhastha Kāṇḍa (G.O.S., CI., 1944).
